THE Manners of Mankind must ever form an interesting enquiry. In every age and climate they display a wonderful diversity of character; and exhibit a picture so variously coloured, that we are convinced by experience alone, that the great original of the whole is Man. In all investigations of this important subject, Language claims a superior degree of attention: in many points it will be found a most unerring guide; and, when viewed on philosophic ground, may be considered as the great barometer of the barbarity or civilization of a people. A poverty of dialect is generally accompanied by savageness and ignorance; refinement is only advanced by a general diffusion of knowledge; and knowledge must necessarily be confined within narrow limits, till written language has conveyed it through every order of men. No authority can, at the same time, so decisively fix the peculiar habits and pursuits of a nation as the sounds by which they articulate their ideas. The vanity of a traveller may heighten a plain story into the marvellous; and the credulity of a historian may give a currency to the fiction: but when radical words in any tongue are expressive of certain customs, objects, and modes of thinking; our reason cannot, for a moment, entertain a doubt of their existence.

INTO this train of thought I have been led by that minute attention to the analysis of the Persian and Arabic idioms, which the construction of my work unavoidably required: and I was willing to soften the extreme painfulness of incessant labour, by occasionally tracing, together with Eastern language, the opposition and coincidence of Asiatic and European customs. Some points will of consequence be touched, which, at first view, may have no apparent tendency to advance the acquisition of those tongues: yet the science of words is, after all, but the outline of language; whilst the colouring and expression are only to be found in the virtues and the genius, in the vices and the follies of a people. In the course of this enquiry I shall have occasion, at the same time, to doubt of many received opinions; and to question the positions of some superior men: whose want of knowledge in the languages of the East has produced much false reasoning; whilst their attachment to system has heaped error upon error, and raised splendid fabricks upon pillars of ice.

THE origin of Ancient Tongues, like all research into high antiquity, is naturally involved in perplexity and darkness; and every disquisition, however ingenious, must rest at last on the uncertain basis of fancy and conjecture. Yet, on this visionary field, learned and pious men have disputed with much want of temper. The original idiom of man has been considered as an interesting pursuit; and advocates have been found for the superior claim of every ancient tongue: Adam has been taught dialects he never knew; and the language even of Omnipotence they have not blushed to determine with precision. To pierce through the obscurity of those distant periods, seems however above the powers of man; and to have no other tendency, than unprofitably to bewilder the human understanding. I shall avoid therefore those unknown regions through which there appears no guide; and confine myself to the simple information of reason and probability.

THE source of the Arabic Language lies far beyond historic proof. Grammarians carry the older dialect to the family of Heber, the fourth in descent from Noah: and the more modern to Ishmael, the son of Abraham. These are Arabian tales: yet they apparently furnish this strong conclusion; That when nations have recourse to fable and tradition for the epoch of an invention, no period, within the demonstration of record, can possibly be found to fix its more exact commencement. Though rude perhaps in its origin, and gradual in its progress to improvement, the richness of the Arabic has been long proverbial; and many circumstances have concurred to render it not only the most copious of any known tongue; but to preserve it uncorrupted amidst all the political and literary revolutions of surrounding states.

THE Arabians were never conquered. The Romans, the Persians, and the Ethiopians, made indeed, at different times, impressions upon particular districts: but they were all too slight, and of too short duration, to introduce any material alteration into their government, their language, or their manners. From very early times, this immense peninsula was divided into many states; some independent, and others tributary to the Tobbas or Hemyaret sovereigns of Arabia Felix. In those states many different dialects prevailed; the principal of which were the Hemyaret and the Koreish. The first, though the language of the most powerful of the Arabian princes, appears however to have been little cultivated by the independent tribes; or even by those who paid them a feudal obedience: a remarkable instance of which is related by Mohammedan writers. An envoy from a feudatory state having been sent to the Tobba, that prince, when he was introduced, pronounced the word T'beb; which in the Hemyaret implied Be seated: unhappily it signified, Precipitate yourself in the native dialect of the Ambassador; who, with a singular deference for the orders of his sovereign, without hesitation or enquiry, threw himself instantly from the castle wall, and perished. The Koreish tribe were the noblest and the most learned of all the Western Arabs: they were also the greatest merchants, and carried on an extensive commerce with every adjacent state; whilst the Kaaba, or Square Temple of Mecca, which, before the era of Mohammed, was solely under their guardianship, drew annually a great concourse of pilgrims from every Arabian tribe, and every country where the Arabian religion prevailed. Where many strangers are accustomed to assemble at stated times, politeness and refinement are a natural consequence. Numbers of the pilgrims were people of the first rank, and possessed of all the science peculiar to their country or their age. Great fairs were held during their residence; and a variety of gay amusements filled up the intervals of their religious duties. Of those entertainments, literary compositions held the most distinguished rank; every man of genius considering not his own reputation alone, but even that of his nation or his tribe, as interested in his success. Poetry and rhetoric were chiefly cultivated and admired: the first being looked upon as highly ornamental;

and the other, as a necessary accomplishment in the education of every leading man. An assembly at a place called Ocadh, had been, in consequence, established about the end of the sixth century; where all were admitted to a rivalry of genius. The merits of their respective productions were impartially determined by the assembly at large; and the most approved of their poems, written on silk, in characters of gold, were, with much solemnity, suspended in the temple, as the highest mark of honour which could be conferred on literary men. These poems were called Moallakat (suspended), or Modhabebat (golden). Seven of them are in many European libraries, being the compositions of Amralkeis, Tarafa, Zobeir, Lebid, Antara, Amru, and Hareth. A story told of Lebid and Mohammed displays the genius and manners of the Arabians in those days. It was customary for the great poets to fix, upon the gate of the temple, distichs, or longer compositions, as a general challenge against the next meeting of the Ocadh assembly. Lebid had put up a couplet there, which was thought so sublime, that none would hazard any thing in competition: till Mohammed at length placing by it the opening of the second chapter of the Alcoran, Lebid no sooner saw it, than he conceived it to be something divine; tore down his own verses; and immediately, from being a determined enemy to the new religion, became one of Mohammed's firmest and most powerful friends. He was particularly useful in answering the lampoons of the prince Amralkeis, who continued, till his death, one of the prophet's keenest and most formidable opponents.

FROM this uncommon attention to promote emulation and refine their language, the dialect of the Koreish was the purest, the richest, and the most polite of all the Arabian idioms. It was preferably studied; and became, about the beginning of the seventh century, the general language of Arabia; the other dialects being either incorporated, or sliding gradually into disuse. By this singular idiomatic union, like the confluence of many streams into one large river, the Arabic has acquired an uncommon fullness: whilst the luxuriance of synonyms, and the equivocal or opposite senses of the same or similar words, have furnished their writers with a wonderful power of indulging, in the fullest range, their favourite passion for antithesis and quaint allusion. Examples of the contrary senses, in which the same words are received, may be found in almost every page of the Dictionary; but a short anecdote from the history of the Khalifs will show how much Eastern genius pointed to such distinctions. The great Mahmoud, Sultan of the Gheznevdes, though the son of a slave, after having stretched his conquests over great part of India and Tartary, in the beginning of the eleventh century, sent an ambassador to the Khalif Alkader, requesting from that prince, as the fountain of honour among the Mohammedans, a title suitable to his rank and power. The Khalif, on account of the meanness of his origin, declined compliance for twelve months: till urged by the ambassador, and dreading Mahmoud's resentment, he sent him at length the ambiguous title ولي veli, which implies, A prince, a friend, and also a slave. Mahmoud easily penetrated the Khalif's meaning; and sent him immediately 100,000 pieces of gold, with a wish to know, Whether a letter had not been omitted. Alkader took the hint, and dispatched instantly letters patent in full form, creating him والي vali, which signifies, without equivocation, a *Sovereign independent Prince*².

As the Pagan Arabians had a number of dialects, they had also a variety of characters; but all of them were so perplexed in their formation, and so difficult in their use, that about the beginning of the seventh century they adopted the invention of Moramer Ebn Morra, a native of Babylonian Irak. In this character the Alcoran was originally written: it was afterwards improved under the denomination of Cufik; and continued in use till the appearance of the Nisikbi, in the tenth century of our era. As this new mode of writing soon universally prevailed, the other gradually declined; and it is now only to be found in the manuscripts and inscriptions of the first ages of the Hejra. The Nisikbi, which, with some variation and corruption, is the same which now prevails in Arabia, Persia, India, and other Eastern countries, is generally ascribed to Ebn Moklab, vizir to the Khalifs Al Moktader, Al Kaher, and Arradi, who reigned from 908 to 940 of our era: but it afterwards underwent the alterations and improvements of many eminent penmen of distinguished rank; particularly of Nezam and Tograi, vizirs to the Sultans Jeleddin and Masud; and of Yakut, secretary to Al Mostafem, the last of the Khalifs of Bagdad³.

THE language spoken anciently in Persia opens a wide field for unsatisfactory enquiry. Dr. Hyde derives it from that of Media; which is much the same as deducing one jargon of the Saxon Heptarchy from another. The union of those people, named by Europeans, the Medes and Persians, is of such high antiquity, that it is lost in darkness; and long precedes every glimmering we can discover of the origin of their speech: whatever their language was, therefore, it must have evidently been very early the same, with the simple and common variation of provincial idiom. But in this tongue we have no genuine remains. We are told, indeed, that it was the language in which Zoroaster promulgated his religion and laws; but this advances not our enquiry: for where or when did Zoroaster live? and where do the works which have been attributed to him exist? The writers both of the East and West speak so vaguely, and differ so pointedly, with regard to this personage, that it is completely impossible to fix either the country or the period which gave him birth: whilst the Zeratust of the Persians bears so little resemblance to the Zoroaster of the Greeks, that unless Dr. Hyde, and other Orientalists, had resolved, at all events, to reconcile the identity of their persons, we should have much difficulty to discover a single similar feature. Those fragments of his supposed works which the learned Doctor has given us, under the title of the Sadder, are the wretched rhymes of a modern Parsi Destour (priest), who lived about three centuries ago: from that work we cannot then have even the glimpse of an original tongue, nor any thing authentic of the genius of the law-giver: whilst the publications of M. Anquetil du Perron (Oriental interpreter to the king of France) carry such palpable marks of the total or partial fabrication of modern times; as give great weight to the opinion of Sir John Chardin; That the old dialect of Persia (excepting what remains in the present language) is entirely lost; that no books now exist in it; and that the jargon and characters of the Parsis of Carmania and Guzerat are barbarous corruptions or inventions of the Guebre priests; without the least similitude to the inscriptions still discernible on the ancient ruins of Persepolis⁴.

In support of Chardin's general idea, I shall make a few observations on M. Anquetil's Zend Avesta. In the first place, The number of Arabic words, found both in his Zend and Pehlvi dialects, furnishes one strong presumption of their modern date; as no Arabic was introduced into the Persian idiom earlier than the seventh century of the Christian era. Secondly, The harsh texture of his Zend seems opposite to the genius of Persian pronunciation; being apparently incompatible with their organs of speech. There are certain sounds, to which we find some nations have an invincible antipathy. The French, the Italians, and other foreigners, can hardly ever be taught to articulate the English th. The Persians, if possible, entertain even a greater aversion to a sound somewhat similar, (or rather t'h, with a strong aspiration); and have accordingly, in every word adopted from the Arabic, changed it uniformly to s. But in M. Anquetil's Zend, the words in which it occurs are uncommonly numerous; and, in his alphabet, we have a character, which, to leave no doubt of the sound he means to give it, he illustrates, by placing it on a line with the Arabic ث th or t'h. The Farshi and Pehlvi dialects, he says, at the same time, were sister descendants from the Zend; and had come off the parent stock previous to the era of Zoroaster: in that idea they must have all been spoken in Persia at the same period: but neither in the Pehlvi, the Farfi, or in the more modern Persian, is there a character to be found in the most distant degree expressive of this sound. That men may be taught to conquer a defect in speech, we know is possible; but that a people should have powers to articulate with facility, in one cotemporary dialect, sounds which they found impracticable in another, is a supposition justified by no example, and diametrically inconsistent with the laws of nature. Thirdly, It appears not to bear the most distant radical resemblance to the modern dialect of Persia: a circumstance which all observation declares to be impossible, had it ever existed as an ancient Persian idiom. No convulsions of government, no efforts of the learned, can ever so far alter a language, as to deface every line of resemblance between the speech of the present day and that of even the remotest ancestry: nothing but the absolute extirpation of the aboriginal natives can apparently accomplish so singular a revolution. If we look into the languages of modern Europe, we shall discover everywhere the strongest features of their Gothic or Celtic original, amidst all the refinement of Roman and Grecian embellishment. If we examine the dialect of the modern Greeks, notwithstanding their slavish subjection to the despotism of the Turks, we shall find the corruption but slightly disguises the original tongue. When we view the Syriac, after that country had long been under the rule of Alexander's successors, the texture we perceive unaltered; a slight mixture of Grecian words making all the difference. When we compare the modern Persian with the idiom which prevailed during the Sassanian dynasty, we observe it now only enriched by a copious introduction of Arabic words; yet still retaining every characteristic feature which it possessed before the Mohammedan conquest. But the Zend, so far from having the least similitude to one of the most regular languages in the world, has more the air of a Lingua Franca, culled from the dialects of every surrounding country; grouped together with little pretension to grammatical propriety; and more pointedly resembling the spells of Necromancers, than the idiom of a people famed at all times for the melody of their accents.

THE last reason I shall offer, on this ground, is the uncommon stupidity of the work itself. The Zeratusht of Persia, or the Zoroaster of the Greeks, was highly celebrated by the most discerning people of ancient times; and his tenets, we are told, were most eagerly and rapidly embraced by the highest in rank, and the wisest men in the Persian empire. But could his success have possibly been so remarkable, had his religion breathed only the most jejune puerilities; without one ray of genius to rescue it from contempt? without a sentiment that could elevate the soul, or give one dignified idea of Omnipotence? What is thrown into the notes from the Vendidad Sadé, will give a specimen of the whole. It is by no means selected as the worst: on that ground my choice must have been much perplexed. It first struck my fancy; and my partiality for it was confirmed, merely from its being shorter than many others, which had even a superior claim to disgrace the human understanding. Upon the whole, M. Anquetil has made no discovery which can stamp his publications with the least authority. He brings evidence of no antiquity; and we are only disgusted with the frivolous superstition and never-ending ceremonies of the Worshipers of Fire.

I SHALL now proceed to make some observations on the modern idiom of Persia; and to point out the origin of that singular and intimate connection which it has long maintained with the language of Arabia. Early in Persia, as in every wide extended empire, there were many provincial dialects, distinguished chiefly by the names of those provinces where they were spoken: the principal of which were the Parfi or Farfi, and the Peblavi. The first was the idiom of Faristan (Persia Proper), and had an extensive range over the most civilized of the lower districts: whilst the Peblavi prevailed chiefly around the Mazenderan or Caspian Sea, and in the more mountainous dependencies of the empire. So rude however was this latter dialect considered, that, after having been discountenanced at court as early, it is said, as the reign of Babaman, it was at length proscribed in a formal edict by Bebram Gur, in the fifth century of the Christian era; and soon after ceased to be a living language. The Farfi, on this event, as it had long been the principal, became now the only idiom of Persia; being subdivided into the Zebani Deri, or the language of the court, and the Zebani Farfi, the dialect of Persia at large. It is to this tongue, which seems to have been peculiarly cultivated by the great and the learned above twelve hundred years before the Mohammedan era, that we should apparently point our researches for Persian literature previous to that period: and not to the uncourtly Peblavi. So early neglected by the superior orders of men, and confined entirely amongst the boorish mountaineers and unlettered peasants, it appears equally improbable, that men of genius should have preferred this rude idiom to the polished Deri; as to suppose a Voltaire to have written in the Bas Breton; or an Addison in the most rugged of our county dialects.

THE Deri was improved with uncommon care by the Sassanian princes; many of whom, as well as their vizirs and great officers, published works in it; which, though at present hardly known, are mentioned with high approbation by succeeding writers. Amongst the chief of those royal and noble authors was Ardeshir Babegan, the first prince of this dynasty, who began his reign A. D. 202. He wrote a Karnamé, or journal of his achievements: and also a work of morality; which being afterwards improved by Noushirvan the Just, (who flourished in the sixth century,) was sent by him to all his governors, as the invariable rule of their conduct. The Zefer namé, written by Bouzour, vizir to Noushirvan, is better known; having been modernized by the celebrated physician and vizir Avicenna, about the beginning of the eleventh century. Those books, could they now be recovered in their original language, would apparently be an acquisition far superior to a thousand such volumes as M. Anquetil's Zend Avesta. Exclusive of their intrinsic value, with regard to Persian History, manners, politics, and morals, they would shew the precise distinction between the ancient and modern idioms. If what Dr. Hyde has given us, as the words of Ardeshir, is authentic, his language, though called Old Persian by that very learned gentleman, is actually, when decyphered, the modern dialect in ancient characters: and if his book is written in the same tongue, (which is probably the case) the whole difference between the language of the early kings of Persia, and that of the present hour, seems to rest entirely in the difference of character, and in the introduction of the Arabic; which began to take place in the seventh century of the Christian era. ^a

BEFORE this period the Arabians, confined within their own peninsula, made no figure on the theatre of Asia; and were, in a political light, known only to be despised by the Grecian and the Persian powers. But the enthusiasm, genius, and intrepidity of one extraordinary man, suddenly changed the scene; and gave a beginning to revolutions equally rapid as compleat. The numerous Arabian tribes Mohammed, by various means, converted to his faith, or subjected to his power; but died before any impression was made upon the adjacent states. Abubeker led the way to foreign conquest; and his successor Omar, in the short space of four years, saw the Khalifat extended from Egypt to the frontiers of India. Persia was one of the noblest acquisitions of the Mohammedan arms; the decisive victory of Kadessia, in the year 636, throwing this mighty empire under the Arabian yoke, as that of Arbela had formerly subjected it to Alexander. The consequences however of the two revolutions had nothing similar: the Macedonian conquest produced only a change of princes; the Kaianian dynasty of Persian kings giving way to the successors of their Grecian conqueror: but that of the Arabians proved a radical subversion of every characteristic circumstance which distinguishes nation from nation. The ancient government of the Persians was overturned; their religion proscribed; their laws trampled upon; and their civil transactions disturbed by the forcible introduction of the lunar for the solar calendar: whilst their language, which the laws of nature preserved from immediate and absolute annihilation, became almost overwhelmed by an inundation of Arabic words; which, from that period, religion, authority, and fashion, incorporated with their idiom. ^b

THE worship of the ancient Persians had unquestionably been very early corrupted. The reverence paid to the Sun and to Fire, which Zoroaster appears to have considered merely as representatives of Omnipotence, the fountain of light, seems to have been an idea too refined for the gross capacities of the vulgar: who, without regard to the great invisible Prototype, turned all their thoughts to the adoration of those ostensible deities. Much absurd and barbarous superstition must in consequence have crept in, and clouded by degrees the purer faith of their ancestors. Upon other grounds it will be difficult to account for that singular severity with which Alexander first, and afterwards the Arabian Khalifs, reprobated the tenets of the Magi; destroyed their books; and persecuted, with unrelenting rigour, all who made profession of their religion. ^c

THE Grecians and Romans had enlarged sentiments of toleration. They adopted the gods of all the nations they subdued: and, in the belief, that every people and every place had their tutelary divinities, they were at uncommon pains to please, and were equally careful in avoiding all offence. From Arrian we learn, that Alexander sacrificed to the Babylonish gods and other Asiatic deities, though then unknown in Greece: and we are told by Pliny, that the first endeavour of the Romans, when besieging a city, was to discover the name of the guardian divinity (without which, it seems, they could make no invocation); when, by promises of greater honours than he had hitherto enjoyed, they endeavoured to bribe him to betray his former votaries. Such having been the extended ideas of the old Polytheists, we are forced to conclude, That some singular circumstances of intolerance and horror had marked the Magian rites, which peculiarly provoked the vengeance of their Macedonian conqueror. ^d

A SIMILAR reason must account for that uncommon severity with which they were crushed by their Moslem masters. These enthusiasts, it must be confessed, knew little of the tolerant principles of the ancient Greeks; and considered it as a religious duty to establish their new faith with fire and sword. To the Christians, Jews,

Sabians, and other sects, they paid, however, some show of respect; and permitted them, if averse to Moslemism, to follow their old belief, on paying a certain extraordinary tribute. But their fury against the Magi knew no bounds; destruction or conversion being the only alternatives they designed to offer. The body of the nation chose the last; whilst the small remainder of confirmed enthusiasts sheltered themselves in the mountains of Kuhistan. Some retired to the isle of Ormuz; whence they afterwards embarked for Diu; and at length, towards the close of the eighth century, they obtained permission to settle in Surat, and other places in the territory of Guzerat: where their descendants, under the denomination of Parsis or Guebres, by avoiding all intermarriage with the aboriginal natives of Hindostan, still maintain themselves a distinct body of harmless and unpowerful people. It may be said, perhaps, that the religion and learning of the Magi was by no means the single object of Mohammedan devastation; the destruction of the famous library of Alexandria being another memorial of the execrable zeal of the Khalif Omar. It is true, that this great but bigoted prince, considering all books which coincided with the Alcoran to be superfluous, and all that opposed its doctrines to be pernicious, issued his barbarian mandate to destroy that noble monument of ancient learning and magnificence: but still there was nothing striking in the persecution of the Egyptians; the general mode of an advanced tribute being all that was exacted, for permission to follow the various religious systems, which prevailed in that country previous to the conquest.

THESE singular events, which marked the fate of the Persian religion, joined to the unsuccessful researches which have hitherto been made, seem to furnish strong collateral evidence in support of the foregoing arguments: and lead us to conclude, with every circumstance of probability, that the original works of the Persian lawgiver have long ago fallen a sacrifice to the ravages of time and of conquest; that the publications of M. Anquetil have no pretensions to authenticity; and that nothing now remains, bearing the names of those once celebrated books, but the absurd ceremonials of the modern Guebres; which preserve, apparently, no nearer resemblance to the ancient Worship of Persia, than the corrupted tenets of the Mingrelians or Georgians have to the Christian religion. The Parsis of Guzerat even acknowledge, that, so far from now possessing the ancient books of Zoroaster, they have not so much as one single copy saved by their ancestors from the general wreck in the seventh century: the formularies which they now use, being only transcripts of a translation by Ardeshir, one of their Destours, who lived about 400 years ago. In Europe, we have had many instances of the forgery of books, in matters of mere curiosity; and we have found their detection difficult: but how much more powerful must have been the temptation to the Guebre priests on the loss of the writings of their lawgiver. Rule was their object; and they ruled with despotism. Absurd ceremony seems to have usurped the place of common sense; and the barbarous dialect of the Zend may possibly have been invented, to throw a more impenetrable veil over their mysterious nothings. A Parsi cannot even pare his nails, or cut his hair, without hundreds of unmeaning prayers, and the most tedious and ridiculous observances. But every omission is gainful to the priest; absolution must be purchased; and a fine is the indispensable consequence of the most minute and involuntary failure.

FROM the seventh till the tenth century, the Persian tongue appears to have laboured under much discouragement and neglect. Baghdad, built by Almanfor, became, soon after the year 762, the chief residence of the Khalifs, and the general resort of the learned and the ambitious from every quarter of the empire: but the Arabic language, in a literary as well as in a religious light, was long the only object of attention and patronage: whilst the Persians, ruled with the iron hand of religious tyranny, seem to have been remembered by the Khalifs only to be despised, plundered, and oppressed. The revolutions of the empire changed at length the scene; and the accession of the Buyah princes to the Persian throne marked, in the tenth century, the great epoch of the revival of Persian learning.

THE khalifat had now lost much of its pristine vigour; the finest kingdoms and provinces of the empire having been usurped by various adventurers, who paid only a tributary obedience to the successors of their prophet. Of those feudatory chiefs, the most powerful were the princes of the house of Buyah, otherwise called the Deylemites; who added to their high rank of kings of Persia, the dignity of Emiru'l'omra to the Khalifs of Baghdad; an office nearly resembling the Maire du palais to the rois faineants of the Merovingian race of France. An outward show of respect and pomp was all that the Head of the Mohammedan religion now enjoyed; whilst the solid power was completely engrossed by the Emiru'l'omra: which high station, about the year 977, was filled by the great Azaduddowla; who first assumed the title of Sultan, afterwards so generally adopted by Eastern princes. He was born at Ispahan, and had a strong attachment to his native kingdom. He was not only an able general and an accomplished statesman, but munificent and learned. His court, whether at Baghdad or in the capital of Persia, was the standard of taste, and the favourite residence of genius. The native dialect of the prince was particularly distinguished; and became soon the general language of composition, in almost every branch of polite learning, after having been almost wholly neglected by literary men for above three hundred years. ^a

FROM the end of the tenth, till the fifteenth century, may be considered as the most flourishing period of Persian learning. The Epic Poet Firdousi, in his romantic history of the Persian kings and heroes, displays an imagination and smoothness of numbers hardly inferior to Homer. The whole fanciful range of Persian enchantment he has interwoven in his poems, which abound with the noblest efforts of genius: and he has stamped a dignity on the monsters and fabling of the East, equal to that which the prince of Epic poetry has given to the mythology of ancient Greece. His language may, at the same time, be considered as the most refined dialect of the older Persian or Deri; the Arabic being introduced with a very sparing hand: whilst Sadi, Jami, Hafez, and other succeeding writers, in prose as well as verse, have blended in their works the Arabic without reserve; gaining, perhaps, in the nervous luxuriance of the one language, what may seem to have been lost in the softer delicacy of the other. ^b

FROM the above period, a literary rivalry seems to have subsisted amongst the Mohammedan princes who had dismembered the Khalifat; every Sultan considering it as an object of the first consequence, to number amongst his friends, the most celebrated poets or philosophers of their age. No expence was therefore spared to allure them to their courts; and no respect was wanting to fix a continuance of their attachment. ^c

AMONGST the most magnificent of those royal patrons of Persian literature were three contemporary princes, who reigned towards the end of the eleventh century; and were remarkable not only for their abilities and liberality, but for the singular and uninterrupted harmony which distinguished their correspondence. These were Malekshah Jelaeddin, king of Persia; Keder ben Ibrahim, Sultan of the Gheznevdes; and Keder Khan, the Khakan, or king of Turquestan, beyond the Gihon. The Khakan was uncommonly splendid: when he appeared abroad he was preceded by 700 horsemen with silver battle-axes, and was followed by an equal number bearing maces of gold. He supported, with most magnificent appointments, a literary academy in his palace, consisting of a hundred men of the highest reputation in the East: Amak, called also Abou'l'najib Al Bokhari, who was the Usta-d-i'shoara, or chief of the Poets, exclusive of a great pension, having, amongst other articles of Eastern luxury, a vast number of male and female slaves; with thirty horses of state richly caparisoned, and a retinue in proportion, which attended him wherever he went. The Khakan used often to preside at their exercises of genius: on which occasions, by the side of his throne were always placed four large basons filled with gold and silver; which he distributed with a liberal hand, to those who principally excelled. ^d

BUT the invasions of Jengiz Khan and Tamerlane, in the beginning of the thirteenth, and end of the fourteenth centuries, gave violent checks to all the arts of peace. The Khalifat and all its feudatory princes were overwhelmed: and altho' Tamerlane, in a variety of instances, was a liberal patron of learned men; that was but a feeble compensation for the general desolation which he spread around; and the destruction of a number of magnificent patrons of the arts, who sunk under the torrent of his irresistible power. — The Turks soon after stretched their government, unfavourable to liberty and science, from Europe to the banks of the Tigris: whilst, in Persia, the bloody reigns of the detested house of Sefi concurred effectually in plunging those noble countries into that melancholy barbarism, from which Europe, during that period, had been gradually emerging. ^e

FOR near three hundred years, the literary fire of the Persians and Arabians seems indeed to have been almost extinguished; nothing hardly, during that time, which deserves attention, being known, at least, in Europe: yet enough exists, to give us a very high opinion of the genius of the East. In taste they are undoubtedly inferior to the Greeks, to the Romans, and to the best writers of modern Europe; but, in invention, they are excelled, perhaps equalled by none. The Arabians are distinguished by a conciseness of diction, which borders sometimes upon obscurity. The Persians affect, on the contrary, a rhetorical luxuriance; which, to a European, wears the air of unnecessary redundancy. If, to these leading distinctions, we add a peculiarity of imagery, of metaphor, of allusion; derived from the difference of government, of manners, of temperament; and of such natural objects as characterise Asia from Europe; we shall see, at one view, the great points of variation between the writers of the East and West. Amongst the Oriental historians, philosophers, rhetoricians, and poets, many will be found, who would do honour to any age or people: whilst their romances, their tales, and their fables, stand upon a ground, which Europeans have hardly yet found powers to reach. ^f

IN various other lights, the usefulness of the Persian and Arabic languages will appear evident, on the slightest examination. The high political consequence of the Persian, in the affairs of India, is too obvious and too generally acknowledged to require arguments to enforce it; whilst the Arabic, totally neglected, or studied with inattention, has never been viewed, in Hindostan, by Europeans, in the important light it merits. Yet the intercourse which the Arabians have maintained with that country, is ancient and intimate. For many centuries, previous to the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope, they were the chief traders in the East; and the commodities of India flowed into Europe, by the way of Egypt and Syria, almost solely through their hands. Their commercial settlements skirted the Indian coasts: their transactions with the Gentoos were extensive; and their language found its way where even their arms and their religion had made no impression. The transactions, sometimes amicable, but oftener hostile, in which the Hindoo Rajahs were engaged with the Mohammedan princes, long before the accession of the house of Timur, opened likewise numberless channels for the introduction and incorporation of this great Mohammedan language; and gave it, in time, such an universal currency in Hindostan, that not only two thirds of the Persian, now in general use there, is pure Arabic; but a half perhaps of the Hindostan or Moors is Arabic and Persian: in the Malay, they also both abound; and they appear even to have found a place in the vulgar Nagree and Bengal. But that which has chiefly astonished me, is to find Arabic technically used, even in the *Code of Gento Law*s. If such words are actually in the original Shanscrit, it is a circumstance which will require a very nice explanation: for, upon general principles, we must, on that ground, question the antiquity of those laws; having at present no foundation to believe, that the Arabic was introduced into Hindostan earlier than the Mohammedan invasion A. D. 708, during the Khalifat of the first Al Walid. But if they are not in the original Shanscrit, and only occur in the Persian translation by the Pundits; there appears to be the same impropriety in their modernizing or translating those ancient law words, as there would have been, had Sir William Blackstone given only the English of such terms as Certiorari or Fieri facias, and omitted the original names of the writs. *

HAVING now traced the progress of the Arabic and Persian languages as far as is consistent with reason, or conducive to utility; I shall proceed to observations on other points, which will be chiefly comprehended under two heads: First, Lights which Eastern language and literature may throw upon ancient history and mythology. Secondly, Customs apparently originating in Asia, which, since the downfall of the Roman power, seem to have influenced the manners of modern Europe. In the investigation of those subjects,

I am unavoidably led to question the opinions of some of the most eminent men in the literary world; who, little acquainted with the languages of the East, and intangled in the labyrinths of ideal system, have built upon a basis of no solidity, and extended error instead of discovering truth. Yet, wherever I venture, on any ground, to differ from exalted characters, I wish it may, be understood, that I lose nothing of that respect to which they are so justly intitled. It is the lot of humanity to err. We may venerate a Herodotus or a Newton, without enslaving the mind by an acquiescence in their failings: we may admire the noblest efforts of human wisdom, without equally revering the unavoidable weaknesses of human frailty. *

SYSTEMATIC writers, upon the actions of mankind, however ingenious and learned, are ever to be read with caution. Man, in the aggregate, is too irregular to be reduced to invariable laws. A slave to passion and to momentary views, the weakest springs have found force sufficient to shake the mightiest states; and events of the deepest consequence have originated from causes which shunned all public view. But a framer of systems thinks not like other men: he forms nations, and he annihilates them; he establishes empires, and he destroys them; he assigns reasons for each fortuitous event; and defines, with mathematical precision, the motives of actions, which were grounded only on caprice, accident, or error. As his fabrick is not founded in nature, he is perplexed by contradictions, which he finds irreconcilable with the principles of truth. Impelled, however, by a warm imagination, he bends every fact to his system, since he cannot rear his system upon facts. He descends from the character of judge: he becomes counsel for a party; and, like the ancient tyrant, tortures every circumstance to adapt it to his iron bed: where defective, he stretches it on the rack; and lops the superfluities, where it threatens to prove too much. Does a dynasty of kings stand in the way of a favourite hypothesis, he cuts them off at once: is there an unlucky chasm in the annals of a people, he makes a fresh creation: does an era gravel his new positions, he removes it back a thousand years; and mangles the chronology of half the world, to support a system of heterogeneous figments. Yet writers of ability will make even error respectable. Though their systems are visionary, they are ingenious and informing. The researches after the Philosophers stone, and Judicial Astrology, which engaged the learning and attention of the middle ages, were wild in themselves; as the objects were beyond the powers of man: yet Chymistry, Astronomy, and Navigation, owe much of their improvement to casual discoveries in those chimerical pursuits. *

THE information we have hitherto received of the Ancient History, Mythology, and Manners of Eastern nations, has been almost entirely derived through the medium of the Grecian writers; whose elegance of taste, harmony of language, and fine arrangement of ideas, have captivated the imagination, misled the judgment, and stamped, with the dignified title of history, the amusing excursions of fanciful romance. Too proud to consider surrounding nations, (if the Egyptians may be excepted) in any light but that of Barbarians; they despised their records, they altered their language, and framed too often their details, more to the prejudices of their fellow citizens, than to the standard of truth or probability. We have names of Persian kings, which a Persian could not pronounce; we have facts related they apparently never knew; and we have customs ascribed to them, which contradict every distinguishing characteristic of an Eastern people. The story of Lyfimachus and one Greek historian, may indeed, with justice, be applied to many others. This prince, in the partition of Alexander's empire, became King of Thrace: he had been one of the most active of that conqueror's commanders; and was present at every event which deserved the attention of history. A Grecian had written an account of the Persian conquest; and he wished to read it before the king. The monarch listened with equal attention and wonder: "All this is very fine," says he, when the historian had finished, "but where was I when those things were performed?"

I MEAN not to assert, that the historians of the East have not their failings as well as those of the West; but their facts, though clothed often in a luxuriance of diction, display little of that national vanity, so conspicuous in the most distinguished of the Grecian writers, which leads to the invention and the embellishment of fiction. Whence they had their materials it is difficult to determine; but even the rudest of people, where they contradict not probability, are entitled to respect in the annals of their own country. In a few circumstances they coincide with the writers of Greece and Rome; this strengthens history: there are many upon which they are silent; this naturally leads to doubt and enquiry: there are numbers in which the opposition is pointed: whom are we to believe? the natives, or the native enemies of a country? those who might have had access to genuine records, or those who probably never could?

It may undoubtedly be objected to the principal historians of Persia, now known in Europe, that they are all subsequent to the Mohammedan era: that Persian literature was almost entirely annihilated in the consequences of the Arabian conquest: that the Grecians wrote nearer to the events which they have recorded; and therefore, though foreigners, have a superior claim to our credence than the natives of after-ages, who must have compiled their annals under many circumstances of discouraging obscurity. These considerations are undoubtedly of weight; and, in all relations where consistency is not hurt, we should certainly allow them every degree of force. It is error alone we should wish to reprobate: it is the path of truth we should wish to clear.

THE chief object of History is to improve the great system of social life, by instructing mankind in the experience of former ages. To answer this important end, it is by no means necessary that every fact we read should be strictly true in all its parts. The Cyropædia of Xenophon, or the Telemaque of Fenelon, may convey lessons, on a variety of points, with an efficacy not inferior to the most unquestioned truths. Where no probability is therefore destroyed; no chronology obviously injured; no superior authority evidently opposed: where the great lines are consistent with the situation of the principal agents; and the consequences arise naturally from the events: such facts are entitled to our belief; and to question them must only display a very unnecessary, and a very unprofitable scepticism. But, where the annals of one nation are tortured into co-incidence with the imaginary eras of another; where mighty details are given, the traces of which cannot be discovered in the countries most eminently interested; where sober truth and rational evidence are sacrificed to vanity, fiction, or exaggeration; such narrations should acquire no authority, because transmitted by the most celebrated of the ancient writers, and copied by compilers of modern times. We should look upon them as fables of mere amusement; and proportion our admiration to their secondary merits alone; elegance of taste, ingenuity of invention, and excellence of style.

WHEN we reflect on the uncertainty of almost every thing merely human: when we observe the obscurity with which all history is involved in its beginnings: when we consider how few writers record the facts of their own observation; and the suspicious mediums through which they derive their knowledge: when we view the partiality of mankind for their country, their party, their opinions; with the necessity, which even the most enlightened, and most unbiassed minds, have found of swimming with the stream of popular prejudice; we must candidly confess, that no particular class of historians have any solid claim to possess themselves exclusively of our belief; in opposition to others, whose narratives, though rational, are repugnant to those which we have been accustomed to receive. Audi alteram partem is an old and an excellent maxim; and impartiality ought ever to impress it on our minds, where opportunity furnishes the means. With channels of information, to which the ancients were compleatly strangers, how difficult is it even now to arrive at the true history of the simplest fact? and how wide of all resemblance does not the same tale appear, as told by people under the opposite impressions of vanity, prejudice, or interest? How justly may we therefore suspect the historians of every darker age, whose materials were defective, and whose imaginations were strong: who lived at periods when imposition was gainful, and credulity unbounded: where the necessary measures to secure the adoration of the Million to a Calf, a Cat, or a Beetle, furnished Priests (the great sources of Egyptian and other ancient annals), with such powerful incentives to the invention of the wildest and the most improbable of fictions. *

TAKE many points of modern history, and all the information we receive is merely what each nation or party has written relative to public affairs: whilst the events themselves are still surrounded with obscurity and doubt. Read the Protestant Writers of France, and every circumstance of horror marks the Massacre of St. Bartholomew's day: but turn to the Catholic page, and it becomes a necessary, a prudent, and a lawful act; the mere preventive of a similar tragedy, meditated by the Admiral de Chatillon against the adherents of the House of Guise. Take two foreign writers of our English history, over whom country and party prejudices ought to have had no influence; and how different is the colouring of the same tale? With Rapin, the Caligulas and the Neros fall short of the inhuman James, on the suppression of Monmouth's insurrection: whilst the mild, the just, the forgiving prince is the portrait of the Pere d'Orleans. Contrast the Memoires de Sully with the Libels of the League against Henry IV. or the Siecle de Louis Quatorze with the Invectives of the Protestant Refugees; and the Glorious Monarch, or the Savage Tyrant appear before you in successive review. To enlarge upon the various opinions of our own writers, on the great events of English history, would be endless and unnecessary: the circumstances I have mentioned being merely intended to inculcate this simple position, That few facts, either of ancient or modern times, are so fully authenticated as to render farther enquiry improper. *

THE Romans have read us many a lesson on Punic faith: had we Punic writers, Merciless Jealousy, and Perfidious Ambition, might, and perhaps with justice, have been retorted on the Romans. The Grecians have told us many a surprising tale of Eastern nations; there can be no impropriety in listening to what those nations say. *

THE reigning families of Persia, previous to the Arabian conquest, are comprehended, by their historians, under four dynasties; the Pisbadadians, the Kaianians, the Ashkanians, and the Sassanians. The Persians, like other people, have assumed the privilege of romancing on the early periods of society. The first dynasty is, in consequence, embarrassed by fabling. Their most ancient princes are chiefly celebrated for their victories over the Demons or Genii, called Dives; and some have reigns assigned to them of eight hundred, or a thousand years. Amidst such fictions, however, there is apparently some truth. Those monarchs probably did reign; though poetic fancy may have ascribed to them ages and adventures which the laws of nature reject. We dispute not the existence of our English Arthur, though we believe not in the Giants and Magic of Geoffrey of Monmouth: and Charlemagne was undoubtedly a great prince, though we subscribe not to the wonderful adventures of Turpin's Twelve Peers. The Dives may have been savage neighbours, conquered by the Pisbadadian kings; and magnified by tradition as Beings of a supernatural species. The Gods, the Titans, and the Heroes of the Greeks; the Giants, the Savages, and the Monsters of Gothic romance, seem all to have originated from similar principles: from that wild irregularity of fancy, and that admiration of the marvellous, which, in various degrees, runs thro' the legends of every darker period of the history of mankind. The longevity, at the same time, ascribed to this race of monarchs, may either have been founded on some imperfect antediluvian idea; or may be resolved, by supposing families instead of individuals: and that the Caiumaras, the Gemshids, and the Feriduns of the East, were merely successions of princes, bearing one common surname; like the Pharaohs, the Ptolemies, or the Cæsars of the West. *

WITH the second dynasty, a more probable system of history seems to commence: yet still the era of Kaicobad, the founder of this house, cannot be precisely fixed. Though historians differ, however, with regard to the chronology of this prince; in one point, which may lead us to ascertain it with tolerable accuracy, they appear, in general, to be unanimous. Darab the Younger, dethroned by Alexander, is called the ninth sovereign of this line. He was assassinated about 330 B. C. If thirty years are allowed therefore as the medium of each reign, or 270 for the nine kings, Kaicobad's sovereignty may probably have commenced about 600 years before our era; which will comprehend the whole of that period of Persian history for which we are indebted to the Greeks. Sir Isaac Newton, it may be objected, with other chronologists, have allowed but twenty years to a reign, and made that the universal standard for all nations: but, with submission to those learned men, nothing carries with it a stronger tendency to unhinge all chronology than such an unmodified system. For if no collateral circumstances of situation, manners, and government are taken into the scale, much confusion must apparently rise. From Zeno till the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, the Emperors of Greece reigned hardly fifteen years; and the Khalifs, from the death of Mohammed till the sacking of Baghdad by the Moguls, little more than ten years each. But, in those and other countries, which have been remarked for a quick succession of princes; revolutions, and assassinations, it will always be observed, have ever disturbed the course of nature: whilst, in regular governments, the medium of reigns has been often lengthened to periods equal or even beyond what is above proposed. From the murder of Henry IV. till the death of Louis XV. only three princes have filled the throne of France; making about fifty-five years to a reign: whilst, in the distracted state of that country, previous to Louis XIII. five kings scarcely completed twelve years each.—As the Persian historians mention therefore no assassinations, nor uncommon convulsions of government; and as the administration of public affairs appears in general to have been fortunate and steady; thirty years, in those ages, when, at the same time, a greater simplicity of life perhaps prevailed, seems to be a calculation by no means stretched beyond the probable line of nature.

THE Kaianian dynasty being supposed then to commence nearly about 600 years before the birth of our Lord, this brings us to the reign of that king of the Medo Persians, called by the Greeks Cyaxares; which, according to Sir Isaac Newton's conjecture, is supposed to have begun in the year of Nabonassar 137 (about 610 B. C.). From this period till the Macedonian conquest, we have consequently the history of the Persians, as given us by the Greeks, and the history of the Persians, as written by themselves. Between those classes of writers, we might naturally expect some difference of facts; but we should as naturally look for a few great lines, which might mark some similarity of story: yet, from every research which I have had an opportunity to make, there seems to be nearly as much resemblance between the annals of England and Japan, as between the European and Asiatic relations of the same empire. The names and numbers of their kings have no analogy; and in respect to the most splendid facts of the Greek historians the Persians are entirely silent. We have no mention of the Great Cyrus, nor of any king of Persia, who, in the events of his reign, can apparently be forced into a similitude. We have no Cresus, king of Lydia; not a syllable of Cambyfes or of his frantic expedition against the Ethiopians. Smerdis Magus, and the succession of Darius, the son of Hystaspes, by the neighing of his horse, are to the Persians circumstances equally unknown as the numerous assassinations recorded by the Greeks. Not a vestige is, at the same time, to be discovered of the famous battles of Marathon, Thermopylae, Salamis, Plataea, or Mycale; nor of that prodigious force which Xerxes led out of the Persian empire to overwhelm the states of Greece. Minutely attentive as the Persian historians are to their numerous wars with the kings of Turan or Scythia; and recording, with the same impartiality, whatever might tarnish as well as aggrandize the reputation of their country; we can, with little pretence to reason, suppose, that they should have been silent on events of such magnitude; had any records remained of their existence, or the faintest tradition commemorated their consequences. Xerxes, according to Herodotus, crossed the Hellespont, attended by no fewer than 5,283,220 souls, and escaped back alone in a fishing boat; the whole almost of this mighty host perishing by the sword, by famine, or by disease. The destruction of such a number would have convulsed the whole of Asia, had it been united under one empire: could it possibly have been unfelt in Persia? Can any man who has made the least observation, at the same time, on history, suppose, for a moment, that such myriads could by any means have been maintained in one collected body; even in the present times, when the art of war, in that particular department, has arrived at a degree of perfection unknown in those ruder ages. The greatest armies, of which we have any rational information, are those of Jengiz Khan and Tamerlane, the most despotic and the most powerful conquerors on record: yet these princes, in all their mighty achievements, were seldom followed by 400,000 men. We are told, indeed, that the army of Tamerlane, on his return from the conquest of India; when he meditated the destruction of Bajazet, and of the sultans of Egypt and Baghdad, amounted to near 800,000 men, previous to the battles of Damascus and Ancyra. Yet those troops were dispersed in different divisions; they were besieging many distant places at the same period of time; and were not, after all, a sixth part of the reputed army of Xerxes: though Tamerlane possessed then an empire and an authority incomparably superior to that of the Persian monarchs in the highest zenith of their power; and was then marching against potentates of infinitely greater political consequence than the Grecians, at the supposed period of this tremendous invasion.

BUT the states of Greece appear, in reality, with regard to the Persians, to have been too far removed from that degree of importance which could hold them up as objects of such high ambition or of such mighty resentment. Till the reign of Philip of Macedon, they are hardly mentioned by the Persian writers, but as tributaries to the Persian empire. Those famous invasions have therefore an appearance of being simply the movements of the governors of Asia minor, to regulate or enforce a tribute which the Greeks might frequently be willing to neglect. Marathon, Salamis, and other celebrated battles may indeed have been real events; but “Numerous as the sands on the shore,” is an idea which, in all times, has been annexed to defeated armies: and the Grecian writers, to dignify their country, may have turned the hyperbole into historic fact; and swelled the Thousands of the Persian Satrap into the Millions of the Persian King. Some of those famed events, it is not impossible too, might have been the mere descents of pirates or private adventurers; either with the view to plunder, or to retaliate some similar expedition of the Greeks; who appear very early to have been a race of free-booters extremely troublesome to the surrounding coasts. The Argonauts, if such heroes ever did exist, are not entitled to a more reputable appellation: and indeed the practice seems to have been too universal to carry with the Greeks the remotest imputation of dishonour. If we look into Homer, Thucydides, Diodorus, and others, we shall discover piracy to have been considered as a profession; but without connecting with it the least opprobrious idea. Strangers are carelessly asked whether they are traders or pirates; and the discovery of either character does not seem to heighten or diminish that respect or degree of hospitality which the manners of the times had annexed to the rank of those roving guests. “Are you merchants bound to any port” (says Nestor, at Pylos, to Telemachus and Mentor), or are you pirates, who roam the seas, without a destined place; and live by plunder and desolation.—In this honourable profession of pirates there may have been many subjects of the Persian empire. Greece, as well as other countries, may have been often the theatre of their rapine and devastation: whilst their success or discomfiture must have been events of too little moment to reach the ears or engage the attention of the Shahinshah, or King of Kings, at the remote cities of Persepolis and Balkh. Suppose, if such an illustration may be allowed, an English pirate to have landed in former times on Madagascar; suppose him to have called himself King of England; and suppose, after putting that island into a dreadful alarm, he had been at length defeated. The Madagascar historians, if any they had, to raise the glory of their nation, might compose a pompous detail of their Marathons and Plataeas: they might repulse the English monarch at the head of any myriads the victors should vauntingly give out, or tradition magnify:

and this might undoubtedly gain credit in Madagascar and in the adjacent isles; whilst the splendid event, unfelt, and even unknown to the British nation, found not a single line in their historic page.

THIS celebrated expedition, amongst many Grecian narratives, equally suspicious, I have particularly selected; as the uncommon greatness of the enterprize, had it borne the least resemblance to truth, must have been too well known in Persia; and made too deep an impression upon the minds of each successive generation, ever to have been totally eradicated. I shall now proceed to trace the great lines of the only single fact of consequence, in which there appears even an irregular co-incidence; I mean the Macedonian conquest. The king who, according to Eastern writers, reigned in Persia immediately before the Darius Codomannus of the Greeks, is called Dara or Darab; the first is synonymous with Shah, and signifies, in Persian, A king. The other, in the same language, implies Possessed by or found on water; which name, they say, he obtained from the following circumstance. The kings of Persia appear to have assumed the privilege of marrying whom they pleased; and sometimes made choice even of their own daughters. The Greek writers confirm the prevalence of this custom; and observe, in particular, that Artaxerxes Mnemon espoused two of his daughters, whom he had successively promised to Tiribazus, one of his Satraps. Bahaman, the sixth king of the Kaianian dynasty, had married his daughter Homai, whom he left pregnant at his death; disinheriting his son Saffan, in favour of this lady and her offspring. Homai was declared heiress of the empire, if not delivered of a son, and regent, in that event, till he was of age to reign. Averse even to the distant prospect of resigning sovereign power, the queen ordered the birth of her son to be concealed; and sent him privately to be exposed in a casket on the banks of the Gihon. The rising of the waters soon swept him away, and threw him on a dyer's bleaching ground. The rich stuffs and valuable jewels, which the poor man found in the casket, convinced him that he was a child of elevated birth. He educated him however as his own son; and wished him to follow his profession: but the prince, unwilling to believe himself the son of a dyer, urged his reputed father so strongly, that the good man discovered at length all he knew; and delivered to him the jewels which he had carefully preserved. Young Darab determined immediately on the profession of arms; and set out for the army, which was then marching against the Greeks. He arrived on the eve of a battle; in which he distinguished himself with such heroism, that his fame reached the queen. The prince was sent for: Homai was struck with his presence: she discovered him by the jewels, and the old man's testimony; and resigned the diadem to him, after having reigned with great reputation about thirty years. This Darab is represented as an accomplished prince, and a successful warrior. Philip of Macedon, amongst others, according to Khondemir, drew upon him his resentment, by refusing to acknowledge his authority. He marched against him; and forcing him to take refuge in a fortress, Philip sued for peace; which was granted, on condition of giving his daughter in marriage to the Persian king, and paying an annual tribute of a thousand Bezets, or eggs of gold. The young queen did not please her royal consort. Tho' pregnant, he returned her to her father's court; where she was afterwards delivered of the famous Alexander, whom Philip educated as his son; and left him his kingdom, with the secret of his birth. Darab having, in the mean time, espoused another lady, she brought him Darab the Younger; who mounted the throne on the demise of his father. This prince is represented by the historians of the East in very different colours from the gentle and amiable Darius Codomannus. His cruelties and oppressions rendered him detested in Persia; and the great lords exhorted Alexander to assert his right to the empire. Encouraged by those general discontents, he resolved upon the attempt; and, as a leading step, informed the ambassadors of Darab, when demanding the annual tribute of the golden eggs, "That the bird who laid them had flown to the other world." This refusal, with the raillery which accompanied it, enraged the king of Persia. He marched immediately, to reduce the Macedonian to obedience. The monarchs met: a bloody battle ensued: and Darab was worsted. He retired to his tent, to take some repose before renewing the engagement; but was stabbed by two of his attendants, who fled immediately to the Grecian camp. Alexander, informed of the murder, hastened to Darab's pavilion. He found him in the agonies of death: he threw himself on his knees, wept, and protested his ignorance of the treason. The dying prince believed him; named him his successor; gave him his daughter Roshana in marriage; requested him to revenge his assassination; to govern Persia by Persian nobles; and expired in his arms. Alexander, they add, chiefly by the counsels of Aristotle, whom they call his vizir, punctually fulfilled these last injunctions of the dying king; the great men of Persia being appointed to the government of the provinces and dependant kingdoms; which they were permitted to hold on the feudal principles of homage, subsidies, and military service, to their conqueror, as Paramount Sovereign of the empire.

HERE is a detail which corresponds with the writers of Greece and Rome in nothing but the catastrophe: and yet, in the whole annals of Persia there is not, perhaps, a single passage which boasts a more intimate agreement. A singular incongruity! How shall we reconcile it? And to whom must we lean? The Grecians are already in full possession of our imaginations: we imbibe a reverence for them in our early years, which it is impossible ever to eradicate; and we are dragged with difficulty to give a candid review to accounts, which, though fully within the line of probability, contradict ideas which we have so long fostered with care. Yet were relations so widely distinct equally new: were China and Tartary substituted for Persia and Greece: were histories of their wars presented to our perusal by the respective historians of those people; and did we perceive nothing in the name, in the achievements, or in the chronology of the principal actors, which could possibly be forced into a consistency, or persuade us that we were reading the same events in which both countries were so importantly interested; what perplexity must accompany our opinion? Should we not naturally conclude, that both had related many fictions, and perhaps some truths? Should we not weigh the apparent authority of their materials; consider who approached nearest to national vanity, prejudice, and pride; and decide at length for those writers, who, though liable to much mistake, appeared not, in so high a degree, to have the same inducements to the commemoration of wilful error? This I mean, however, in respect to the general idea: for, in many circumstances of the above relation, I should certainly incline to the Greeks: but more from a strong collateral presumptive evidence, than any superior dependence upon their historians: I allude to Demosthenes. Philip appears, from the orations of this great man, to have been too much engaged in the uniting or enslaving of the Greeks not to have shunned, till that great object was accomplished, every circumstance which might embroil him with Persia; whilst, had he ever been defeated by that nation, and obliged, in consequence, to submit to tribute, it must have not only too much weakened that power, with which he at length subjected the states of Greece, but furnished facts too important to have been omitted in the Philippics.

THERE is one circumstance, amongst many others, which, in the course of my reflections on the disagreement of the Persian and Greek historians, has ever struck me with much force. The language of Greece was early cultivated in the East: the connexion of the Persians and Arabians with the successors of Alexander in Syria and Egypt, was long and intimate. Before the era of Mahomet, it was considered as a branch of polite, and even of mercantile education. Greek slaves were common in Arabia; the receipts and disbursements of the treasury of the Khalifs were written in that tongue for several generations after the Prophet's death; and the coins of the Khalifat were invariably struck with Greek inscriptions, till the reign of Abdolmelic in 695. Many of the Mohammedan princes gave also great encouragement to translations from the Greek; particularly of the prose writers. That the Grecian histories must have consequently been known, especially to their learned subjects, cannot I think, with reason, be called in question. Shall we suppose then, that Oriental annalists would not have made great use of those writers, had their narratives been in the least degree consistent with the histories and traditions which the Persians themselves considered as authentic? That all Persian books were not destroyed by the Arabians, is certain. Some, which concerned not the religion of the Magi, fell into the hands of those who admired and preserved them. The Zefer namé, a dialogue on government and morality between Noushirvan the Just, king of Persia, and his vizir Bouzour, has been already mentioned. In the preface to a copy of Firdousi's Shah namé, we are informed, that a book of history was discovered, during the general havoc, by Saad, one of the Mahommedan generals, and carefully preserved by him; as containing nothing repugnant to the tenets of the Alcoran: and M. D'Herbelot observes, that it was from a collection of Ancient Persian Historians, in the older dialect, that Firdousi drew materials for his immortal work. The kings and great men of the East, it may also be observed, have long rivalled one another in nothing more than in the excellence of their libraries. With incredible attention and expence, they stored them with every valuable manuscript they could possibly procure; and whatever unrelenting severity a vanquished prince might, by Eastern custom, experience from his more fortunate competitor, his books appear ever to have been an object of uncommon care.

EXCLUSIVE of such Persian authors as escaped the Arabian proscription, with other records, of which our imperfect knowledge of their language, and slender intercourse with their country, has hitherto deprived us of any positive intelligence; one ground of presumptive information ought not to be wholly disregarded; I mean Tradition. What are the relations of ancient Egypt? What are the early annals of Babylonia, of Greece, of Rome? Except the sacred writings, what, in a word, is every species of history a little way beyond 2000 years? Mere Tradition! and much of it of the most doubtful and improbable complexion: the Traditions of Pagan priests, whose importance rested on the invention and propagation of error. If any dependence then is placed on those Western tales, in the absence of more convincing evidence, candour ought to allow a pro-portionable degree of weight to those of the East. In all countries where any difficulty, from whatever cause, has been found in the registering of public events, Tradition has ever been observed to flourish with superior strength; and, through the medium of marvellous embellishment, presents us often with the great lines of the achievements of former times. Where the written memorials of a people are few, and where fewer still can read them; he who rehearses a rude poem, or a romantic tale, is looked up to with respect. Whatever exalts men above their peers, will ever be cultivated with care; and sons will often endeavour to excel in what had raised their fathers to distinction. The prevalence of tradition, in the darker ages of Europe, is unquestioned. The Bards, the Scalds, and the Minstrels, were cherished by the rudest warriors of those barbarian times. Their older compositions are generally considered as the real actions of ancient chiefs: fiction prevailed not so much till later ages: it was the offspring of refinement; and refinement led the way to the downfall of oral record. For when learning became more diffused; when feudal lords considered it as no disgrace to sign their names; when written language became disseminated thro' various orders, and many could read the history of those deeds which formerly had been confined to the knowledge of a particular order of men; their songs wanted novelty; they were no longer sought after; their profession fell into contempt; and at length was gradually extinguished.

A VARIETY of circumstances peculiar to Asia justifies us in supposing, that tradition was more vigorous in the East than even in the West. In Persia, India, Tartary, Arabia, from the earliest times, it has been one of their favourite amusements to assemble, in the serene evenings, around their tents; on the platforms with which their houses are in general roofed; or in large halls erected for the purpose; in order to amuse themselves in various exercises of genius; and frequently in traditional narratives of the most distinguished actions of their remoter ancestors. Oriental imagery might often indeed embellish their tales; but, like the Gieurusalemme of Tasso, or the Lusade of Camoens, the embroidery of the imagination would not entirely conceal the ground-work of truth. Much rational information will therefore be discovered, not only in their more serious traditions, but also amidst the amusing wildness of their romantic fables. Even in the Arabian Nights Entertainments, and other Eastern tales, though we may find no necessity to believe in Aladdin's lamp, in the Genie Danhabh, or the Faery Peri banou; we shall, nevertheless, discover a truer picture of Eastern manners and beliefs, than in all the Grecian writers; or in hundreds of other books, more generally resorted to as authorities. The very havoc made amongst the Persian records, with the oppression under which they groaned during the three first centuries of Arabian subjection, might have united more intimately their men of knowledge; rendered their meetings more frequent, and their traditions more interesting: from an apprehension that they would drop into oblivion, if not strongly and repeatedly impressed upon the memories of the rising generation. That many events may have been in this manner preserved in poems and legendary tales, like the Runic fragments of the North, the Romanzes of Spain, or the Heroic Ballads of our own country, seems to be highly probable; as well as that such materials may have originally suggested to Firdousi many of the adventures in his Shah namé; which, like Homer, when stripped of the machinery of supernatural beings, is supposed to contain much true history, and a most undoubted picture of the superstition and manners of the times. Professed story-tellers, it may also be observed, are of early date in the East. Even at this day, men of rank have generally one or more, male or female, amongst their attendants, who amuse them and their women, when melancholy, vexed, or indisposed; and are generally employed to lull them asleep. Many of their tales are highly amusing, especially those of Persian origin. They were even thought so dangerous by Mohammed, that he expressly prohibited them in the Alcoran. The following is given as the reason. An Arabian merchant, called Nasser ben Hareth, having resided long in Persia, returned to his own country whilst the prophet was publishing his Alcoran. Nasser having, perhaps, paid constant attendance at the meetings above alluded to, had treasured up a number of stories relative to the famous Asfendiar, Rostam, and other ancient heroes of Persia. These he related to his countrymen: they thought them excellent: the legends of the Alcoran were even neglected; and they plainly told Mohammed, when rehearsing some verses he pretended to have just received from heaven, that the Persian tales were far superior to his. This alarmed him: and he immediately produced part of a chapter, as sent by the Angel Gabriel, declaring them impious and pernicious fables, hateful to God and to his prophet: a censure which instantly and long checked their currency with all true believers in the new religion.*

ANOTHER circumstance, which must have greatly contributed to the preservation of written and traditional history in the East, is Pride of Blood; upon which their great men value themselves far beyond the proudest European grandee. Genealogy has consequently long been cultivated with singular attention; and the following, amongst other reasons, may be assigned for it. The desultory form of government, which has in general prevailed in Asia, has seldom left any security but the sword for the possession of power. Reverses of fortune have, in consequence, been frequent and sudden; and it has been no uncommon object to behold a man rising to sovereignty, whose father had been in the meanest condition of mankind. Yet this abject creature might possibly have been descended from some ancient dynasty of kings, whom a similar revolution had driven from their throne. The most powerful and most favoured nobles would naturally, at the same time, share the fate of their prince. Some obscure corner or distant country might give them refuge; where a regard for personal safety, and the prospect of a new revolution, would induce them to conceal, under a mean disguise, the royalty or nobleness of their origin. This gave an extensive range to claims of superior Birth; and whether real or imaginary, they were considered as points of too much consequence to be neglected by a new monarch, a successful general, or a rising statesman. Every species of evidence was therefore anxiously sought for; and the skilful in genealogy were encouraged with a liberality that had nothing European in it. Innumerable proofs might be brought: I shall mention a few. Ardesfir, surnamed Babegan, who (A. D. 202.) wrested the sceptre from Ardeban, the last king of the Afhkanian dynasty, was the son of a shepherd, who kept the sheep of one Babeg, and married his daughter. No sooner however was he fixed upon the throne, than, with the assistance of genealogists, he proved his descent from Sassan, the disinherited son of Bahaman. Buiah, the father of Amaduddowla, the first Persian monarch of the Deylemite race, was a fisherman; but his son, when he assumed the diadem, (A. D. 932.) traced the family to Behram Gur, who reigned in the middle of the fourth century. Seljuk, the founder of the Seljukian dynasty of Turks, claimed kindred to Afrasiab, an ancient king of Turan or Scythia, who makes a conspicuous figure in the early periods of Persian history. One of the first cares of Tamerlane was to ascertain his relationship to Jengiz Khan: farther it was unnecessary to go; for that conqueror, in the meridian of his greatness, had carried up a regular pedigree to Turk, the son of Japhet. Ismael Sofi, the first king of the late reigning family of Persia, who, after defeating the princes of the White Ram, mounted the throne about the year 1502, traced immediately his genealogy to the Khalif Ali and Fatima, the daughter of the Prophet. It must be unnecessary to multiply examples: inferior men were equally ambitious of high descent: whilst it may not be unworthy of remark, that the whole idea appears to have originated more from fashion or a natural impulse of the mind, than any consideration of state policy: for we by no means find that the people of Asia have ever distinguished themselves for attachment to royal blood; having submitted, in general, with equal facility to sovereign power, whether administered by the son of a prince or the son of a peasant. *

SUCH having been the ruling passion in the East for illustrious descent, it is hardly necessary to observe, that Genealogy is a study so intimately connected with Historical knowledge, that it is impossible to arrive at any proficiency in the one, without being minutely versed in the other: but particularly on the present ground; where appeals to the eras and actions of distinguished men, through whom it would be necessary to connect the chain of evidence, must have required a very critical acquaintance with chronology and public facts: to avoid obvious contradictions, and give an air of plausible accuracy to pedigrees, which, in many cases, must have been more specious than solid. †

THE same elevation of sentiment, we may also observe, which inspired those high ideas of superior birth, led naturally to a wish for future fame. To add to the glory of a family line was a favourite object. Historians and poets were, of consequence, often in the train of a successful conqueror. They were witnesses of the events they were to deliver down to future times; and they were neither expected to exaggerate nor invent. The riches and honours conferred therefore on men of genius, has nothing similar in our western world: whilst the freedom of their strictures, and the manliness of their moral lessons, will hardly be conceived by those who have been accustomed to annex to Eastern minds the feelings alone of servility and terror. We have, in consequence, particular histories, not only of almost every Eastern Dynasty, and of every distinguished prince, but of the principal countries and cities of Asia; most of them written with such an apparent adherence to truth and impartiality, that they are almost constantly preferred to European writers by our modern historians of the Cruzades and other Eastern events of the middle ages. The royal and noble authors of Asia are, at the same time, numberless: a catalogue alone would fill a volume. I shall here only take notice of the Vizir Nezam ul mulk, as a small manuscript of that great man's will furnish me with several curious facts relative to Eastern manners. Nezam rose from a private station in the eleventh century, to be Vizir to the Sultan Alp Arslan and his son Malekshah Jelaeddin; which high office he held till near ninety years of age; when he was stabbed by a Batanist, one of the subjects of the Old Man of the Mountain; whilst he was reading a petition which the assassin had presented. This Vizir was one of the most extraordinary men of any age or country. He was a compleat statesman and a consummate general. He was learned: and a most munificent patron of learning. He founded and endowed many seminaries of science, but particularly a noble college at Baghdad. His palace was ever open to men of genius; many of whom enjoyed great pensions from his privy purse. They looked upon themselves as his subjects and children, and usually attended their benefactor, on great solemnities, from every quarter of the empire. ‡

FROM the foregoing observations, which might be swelled by many authorities, I apprehend it will appear sufficiently evident, that the Persians and other Asiatics have been remarkably attentive to the annals of their country: that their materials for ancient history are upon a footing of respect not inferior to those of more Western nations: that their traditions are upon a ground fully as substantial as those of the Greeks, the Egyptians, and other people of high antiquity: and that the ambition of royal and noble descent, more conspicuous in Asia than even in the more western regions, must have been productive of much research, and opened uncommon channels for genealogical and historical investigation. — When we strengthen this chain of facts and probabilities, by considering how high in favour physicians and other learned Greeks were at the courts of almost every Mohammedan prince; when we consider the number of merchants and other travellers in perpetual motion between the East and West; when we consider the frequent embassies; the alliances by marriage; the familiarity of conversation, which appears to have been supported with an ease wherein interpreters had evidently no concern: and when we add to the whole, the singular attachment of the princes of the East to almost every species of learning, whilst Constantinople was the theatre of every barbarity that could degrade human nature: the presumption is much stronger, that the Asiatics spoke Greek, than that the Grecians spoke Arabic or Persian. As every ground of reason seems to lead us therefore to conclude, that the Greek tongue was, for many centuries, known in the East, nearly as well perhaps as it now is in Europe; we must extinguish all curiosity in man, and contradict every characteristic disposition of human nature, if we suppose that the Grecian accounts of Ancient Asia should have remained, for so many ages, wholly unknown to the men of erudition, who wrote; or the men of rank, who patronized them. History is one of the first objects which engages the attention, when dipping into a foreign tongue. Sovereigns and ministers of state must ever, above all men, be interested in knowing what strangers say relative to their own or neighbouring kingdoms. The Khalif Almamoun, in particular, was a prince of extensive erudition, and unbounded curiosity. He could not well be indifferent with regard to what the ancients might say relative to Babylonia, his royal residence and seat of government. He had ordered, without restriction, a general collection of Greek authors to be made for the purpose of translation; and it is impossible to suppose that Historians could be excepted. They must have been submitted, amongst the rest, to the review of the learned: their subject would naturally be reported to the Khalif; and if not translated, it could apparently arise only from the consideration, that their history of those countries seemed merely the Tale of a Tub seriously told; and by no means agreeable to the belief either of the aborigines of the country, or of the ingenious men of all nations, who, from every quarter of the empire, flocked to Baghdad, as the centre of magnificence and science. When we reflect then, that the Mohammedan writers have paid no regard to the Grecian histories: that they have given us facts of a very different complexion: that no historian will ever presume to publish annals of his own country, totally dissimilar to the great lines of ancestral achievement, which must ever remain strongly impressed upon the minds of a people; and that those histories of Persia are considered as genuine by the Asiatics in general: no observation on the manners of mankind can justify a total disregard to them; though dissonant to the relations which we have hitherto been accustomed to receive. Modern compilers of Ancient History may wish indeed to conceal their ignorance of the languages and literature of the East under one general unsupported assertion, that they are wild, uninteresting, and obscure; but such a mode of indiscriminate censure can tend only to perpetuate error. Truth ought to be searched for wherever it can be found; and a well authenticated fact, if told by a Persian, an Arab, or a Chinese, should remove an improbability, though adorned with all the eloquence of Greece or Rome. *

IT will not be conceived, however, that I wish any ancient story exploded but upon grounds of obvious propriety. A free and candid investigation is all that is proposed. Even the most impossible and most absurd of the Grecian and Roman fables may keep their ground, till more rational and well supported facts appear to fill their room. Any thing is better than a vacuum. Geographers of unknown regions, according to the poet, place in their maps "Elephants instead of towns:" and there can be no harm in allowing the Elephantine legends of Old Greece still to amuse our leisure hours: but if a town is at length discovered, the Elephant should surely change his station. Semiramis, the Argonauts, Sesostris, and half the marvellous tales of early times, are all Elephants: but as they would leave a mighty blank in those high ages of fable, they may still continue to fill their respective niches; like Bacchus, and Venus, and Hercules, and Ceres: but I cannot help thinking, that it is refining rather too much upon the credulity of man, to fix, like the great Newton, the precise epochas of those Pagan Gods and Heroes; by introducing even eclipses, and other astronomical observations, to demonstrate the eras and adventures of beings, whose existence stands upon a ground by no means more substantial than the Garagantua of Rabelais, or the Brobdignaggs of Lemuel Gulliver. "I do not pretend, says Sir Isaac, (in the eighth page of his Chronology), to be exact to a year: there may be errors of five or ten years, and sometimes twenty, and not much above." This publication, indeed, bearing the name of the immortal Newton, though highly built upon by subsequent chronologers, is so unspeakably inferior to that great man's other works, that I am almost unwilling to believe it's authenticity; and can hardly be persuaded he ever would have published it himself. The materials of which it is composed were probably mere memoranda, committed to paper in the intervals of relaxation from more abstracted studies. He could not but perceive contradictions and impossibilities in the ancient historians, and in the systems of those who had framed chronologies from their data. Something he might have meditated, and something we might have had, of authority similar to his higher demonstrations; had he lived to have sent it into the world, completely considered, and finished with that penetrating discernment, which so remarkably distinguished his philosophical investigations. But this remains to be regretted. Posthumous publications are always to be suspected; and many a great man's fame has felt most cruel stabs from the avidity of the public for even the gleanings of superior genius, and the undiscerning zeal of some surviving friends. *

LET us now take a slight view of the consistency of the Greek writers, and the more modern chronologers, with regard to a few of the famous personages and events of antiquity, and then candidly determine the justice of their claim to unlimited belief and authority.—Queen Semiramis, according to Ctesias, lived about 2280 Before Christ: Helvicus says 2248: Syncellus 2177: Petavius 2060: Eusebius 1984: Dr. Jackson 1964: Archbishop Usher 1215, Philobiblius (from Sanconiathon) 1200: Sir Isaac Newton 760: Herodotus 713: and D'Herbelot, supposing her to have been the Persian queen Homai, grandmother to Darab II. (Darius Codomannus), brings her down within four hundred years of our era. Diodorus, Strabo, Suidas, Arrian, and others, differ also in various degrees: whilst the actions they ascribe to her are as monstrous and impossible, as the disagreement of their respective eras. *

THE Argonautic Expedition has, by many learned men, been considered as a fact so unquestionable, that it has become a kind of grand era for ascertaining the more doubtful dates of many subsequent events. Sir Isaac Newton, by calculations of the retrograde motion of the Equinoctial and Solstitial points, called the Colures, from their supposed place then, till the year 1690, fixes this expedition about the year 937 B. C. grounded chiefly upon a supposition, that the Greek Sphere was invented by two of the Argonauts Chiron and Musæus; who delineated the expedition, under the name of the Argo, amongst the Asterisms. But this seems to be a fundamental error into which this great man has fallen, even in his own line. Canopus, the chief star of Argo, is only 37 degrees from the south pole: the greatest part of the constellation is still nearer to it. The course of the supposed voyage from Greece to Colchis lies between 39 and 45 degrees of north latitude. A few only of the lesser stars can possibly be seen in the whole track: whilst those of the first magnitude, and which alone are deserving of notice in every astronomical observation, are, in those parts, totally invisible. But had this sphere been constructed by the Argonauts; and had they wished to commemorate the enterprize by placing their ship amongst the stars; they must apparently have chosen a constellation which was conspicuous in Greece; and not one, the visible stars of which were too minute to attract attention, or to be of the least use in the direction of their navigation. But in fact the very foundation of this astronomical question has no basis: we have no demonstration of the era of Chiron and Musæus, or even of their existence. The invention of the sphere, rude as it confessedly was, and by no means a solid ground for exact calculation, is at the same time assigned to many who were not Argonauts: and their pretensions seem equally substantial. Diodorus ascribes it to Atlas; some attribute it to Palamedes; others to Nausicaa, the daughter of king Alcinous; and many deny it to have been even of Grecian origin, but to have come from Egypt. Granting therefore that the equinoctial colure actually passed through the middle of Aries, when that sphere was constructed, no argument can possibly be drawn from thence to fix the Argonautic expedition, any more than the building of the pyramids, till it has been previously shown that the Argonauts were the inventors. ^b

LET us next consider the Argonauts in point of number, their course, their achievements, and the time employed in the expedition. Fifty-one is the highest amount: some make them only forty-four. Yet these heroes, besides many other important feats, attack Laomedon and take Troy; they build cities and temples in various distant countries, which half a million could neither have erected nor peopled; and return to Greece in four months, or, according to some, in two.

The course they steer is equally full of contradiction. On their return from Colchis, they found, it is said, Ætes, the king of that country, whose fleece and daughter they had stolen, prepared with a fleet to dispute their passage through the Bosphorus of Thrace. Declining an engagement, they struck across the Euxine, and sailed up the Danube, the Don, or some other river, through Northern Europe, into the Baltic; and thence returned, by the Mediterranean, to Greece. Some conduct them from the Danube to the Po or the Rhone; and others, by the southern ocean, through Lybia. Another class traces them over the great continent of Asia into the Indian ocean, the Red Sea, and the Nile; dragging their Argo all the way over mountains, or carrying it on their shoulders, where they could not conveniently sail. It is unnecessary to dwell upon the more minute deviations. Some make Hercules the commander, others insist for Jason; and even the place of destination is varied from Colchis on the Euxine, to the extremity of the Indian coast. Diodorus, to give the whole an air of probability, contradicts, in many respects, every prior account, and makes them return through the Hellepont; leaving all their famous buildings, to which he himself, nevertheless, frequently alludes, to be reconciled to an agreement with this route by the reader or any subsequent historian. It would be endless to enlarge upon the various impossibilities of this celebrated enterprize: and indeed the accounts given by Diodorus, Strabo, and other later writers, were there no other inconsistency, seem at once to be a complete refutation of the whole. They saw the incongruity of their predecessors: absurdities and contradictions in almost every line could not well escape their penetration. They went therefore upon a different plan. They took part of one, part of another, threw in conjecture with a liberal hand; and formed from the whole an hypothesis, which might give an author some slight air at least of consistency with himself. Their tales are more plausible; yet still they are but tales: we cannot call them facts. Such however has been the system apparently adopted by every subsequent chronologer and compiler. Diodorus appears to have been the model. We have, in consequence, ancient events, not as they really happened, but as it was thought they should have happened. In their hands early history has acquired, in some respects, the superficial appearance of probability; but as much may be said for Pharamond or Cassandra; and Oroondates, Arfaces, and the Fair Barfina, may throw in their claim to be realized, with equal pretensions to reason as Hercules, Jason, or Medea.

To launch upon the ocean of chronology would require a separate and an extensive treatise. It may only be proper here to observe, that all the eminent men in this line have split upon the Rock of System. A favourite hypothesis being once adopted, they bend every thing to a co-incidence. Sir John Marsham and Sir Isaac Newton, for example, fancy a similitude between Shishac king of Egypt and Sesostris, whose being and period of existence is as doubtful as Semiramis. The fabulous Sesostris conquered half the world; but the Shishac of Scripture only plundered Jerusalem and returned. All the resemblance that can be discerned is, that they are both said to have been kings of Egypt; and that they had both great armies: yet to force them into a point of contact, Sesostris is brought down some hundreds of years from the station where ancient historians had placed him; and circumstances totally dissimilar are racked into a most unsatisfactory proof of their similitude. But, with less violence, Charlemagne and Louis XIV. might be made the same person. They were both kings of France; both were powerful princes; and both possessed, to a very high degree, the thirst of extensive conquest, and the consequent luxury of making mankind wretched.

BUT the endeavours of commentators to reconcile all the events of ancient times to the history of the Greeks, have by no means been confined to pagan annals. The chronology of the Sacred Writings has, in many points, without the appearance of necessity, been forced into an analogy with their imaginary eras: in consequence of which, a variety of anachronisms have been introduced, which are in direct opposition to the Historical Books of Scripture, to the Jewish Chronicles, to Josephus, and to all observation on the longevity of man. I shall attempt to clear up one event, submitting, with much deference, the solidity of my conjectures to men of deeper research and superior abilities. The Grecians have given us the history of a Persian King, called Küper, which we translate Cyrus. Isaiah prophesies, that a prince named כורש Coresh will release the Jews from captivity, and order the rebuilding of the temple. To reconcile these two princes, has been considered as an object of high importance; and much learning has been employed to embarrass a much more simple and satisfactory chronology. The Jewish larger chronicle, and Josephus, finish the building of the temple only about thirty-four years before the fall of the Persian empire: the Samaritan interruptions had protracted the completion of the work near twenty years: the Macedonian conquest took place about the year 331; to which, if we add the fifty-four years above-mentioned, the proclamation of Coresh must have been issued about the year 385. But the death of Cyrus is placed, by the concurrence of our chronologers, in 529, or 144 years before this period: he therefore could not be the prince alluded to by Isaiah. As a confirmation of the probability of the Jewish dates, Josephus mentions expressly, that Sanballat, the Samaritan governor, who had given so much interruption to the building of the temple, was alive in the time of Alexander; which is extremely possible by the above chronology: but by the common system, he must then have exceeded 200 years of age. Jaddua was the High Priest who met Alexander on his return from the siege of Tyre, in the year 332. Now by the Sacred Writings we find, that Jaddua was the fifth in succession from Jeshua, who, together with Zorobabel, conducted home the captive Jews. This event, if connected with the Grecian Cyrus, must have been in the year 536, or 204 years before the above-mentioned meeting; which happened in the seventh year of Jaddua's priesthood. As Jeshua was probably advanced in age, when commissioned with Zorobabel to lead the captive people home, seventeen years may be a full allowance for his dignity, subsequent to that period; which leaves forty-five years each to the other four; a term far beyond all calculation and probability: especially as the Jewish high priesthood was remarkable for a very quick succession. The opinion and records of the Jews, when fixing the chronology of the building of this temple, an event which must have made so powerful an impression upon the minds of the whole nation, ought indeed to have been decisive; where no opposition especially was found to the Canonical Books. But for no reason that can apparently be discovered, excepting to force the Coresh of Isaiah to be the Cyrus of the Greeks, have our commentators laboured to involve a plainer narrative in darkness; and to create with many a doubt of the whole, because there appeared irreconcilable contradictions in the parts.

As an attachment to the chronology of Greece seems to have led therefore to many unnecessary liberties with Scripture, it cannot be improper to observe, how far the historians of Asia correspond with the Sacred Writings. Those kingdoms, known to us by the names of the Assyrians, Medes, and Babylonians, appear, from the Eastern writers, to have formed early one great empire; subject to the kings of Persia, on a tenure nearly resembling the feudal system. The principal of those dependent principalities seems to have been Babylon; which, during the reign of Lohorassb, was governed by a prince called Nabocodnassar, Nakhtunassar, or Bakhtunassar; who is described as having pushed his conquests far into the West: and particularly to have over-run Judea, and made captives of the inhabitants. His son and successor is painted as a brutal tyrant; whose oppression of the Jews drew upon him the resentment of Ardeshir Dirazdest, king of Persia; who removed him from the government, and appointed in his room Coresh, a prince of the blood, grandson of Lohorasb. The mother of this prince, they add, was a Jewess; and this they give as one reason for the warmth with which he espoused the cause of the Israelites: to whom he gave permission to return to Jerusalem, with every encouragement towards the rebuilding of the temple. Now let us observe the chronology, and we shall find a remarkable concurrence. Darab II. is said, by the Persian historians, to have reigned fourteen years: Darab I. twelve; and queen Homai thirty; whose immediate predecessor, as before observed, was Ardesbir. If we place then the issuing of the proclamation two years before Ardesbir's death, this brings it to the year 388, B. C. a difference of only three years from the Jewish dates; and of small consequence in such remote transactions. Ardesbir reigned long: let us suppose thirty-eight years before the proclamation of Coresh; add about thirty more for the reign of Kishtasb; and the commencement of the Seventy years captivity will be placed in the end of the reign of Lohorasb, by whose orders Nabocodnassar, as before observed, conquered Syria, Palestine, and other Western districts.

THE great lines co-inciding thus, in a manner so singular, I shall proceed to observations on the seeming disagreement of some inferior points. It appears evident, both from Daniel and the Persian historians, that Coresh or Cyrus acted a subordinate part in the taking of Babylon; the name of his superior being, according to the Sacred Writers, Darius the Mede; but, according to the Persians, Ardesbir or Bahaman. No etymological ingenuity, it is certain, can discover a resemblance between those names: but that does not seem to be of the smallest consequence. The great rock, as observed above, upon which our chronologers have uniformly split, is an attention to the fancied similitude of names; and to this they have often sacrificed every consistency of fact. But nothing can offer a more unsubstantial basis. It has been long a custom in the East for the reigning sovereign to give his son some important government, with the title of king; and this name he generally changed when he succeeded to his father. The son and successor of Shapor II. in the fourth century, was called Kermanshab, and by our writers Carmanas; but when he mounted the throne of Persia he assumed the name of Babaram. Jengiz Khan, in the early part of life, was called Temujin. Many of the Great Moguls have bore different names before their accession. Similar instances are innumerable. It was even common in Greece: Plato was originally named Aristo. That an alteration of names prevailed greatly in old times, we have remarkable proofs in the Paralipomena books of Scripture. When Esther was selected amongst other virgins for the royal choice, her former name Hadaßab was dropt; and a new one given to her, signifying, in Persian A star. When Daniel, Hananiah, Misbael, and Azariah, were chosen to attend the king, their names were changed to Belteshezzar, Shadrach, Mesbach, and Abednego. All nations, we may also observe, have had a greater or less partiality for metonymical and metaphorical allusions: and many personages have been often described by some peculiar attribute, or title, which was perfectly well understood by those to whom the speech or writing was addressed, tho' by no means obvious to others without a key. In the Sacred Writings, a history of the Persian empire is not intended: such points only are touched upon, as are connected with the annals of the Jews: to be intelligible to the chosen people is all that was proposed: the name, the title, or the epithet of the sovereign of Persia, which was most familiar to them, was consequently chosen: and whether it was the King, the Great King, Darius, or any corresponding denomination, it was certainly a point of no importance, whilst they all were perfectly understood. Dara, as observed before, signifies, in Persian, a Great King; and the addition of Median might simply denote that his chief residence was in that country. The different Persian monarchs of the Kaianian dynasty, had a partiality for different cities in their extensive empire. Lohorasb was so remarkably fond of Balkh in Khorassan, that he is often called Balkbi. His successor Kishtasb gave the preference to Istakbar or Persepolis. Bahaman might have lived occasionally in Media; and possibly have marched from thence, attended by Coresh, on the expedition against Babylon. Queen Homai was particularly attached to Persepolis; where the Asiatic historians say she built the celebrated palace which they name Chehelminar, afterwards destroyed by Alexander: and, as this became the favourite abode of her successors till the Macedonian conquest, we accordingly find that every subsequent event, mentioned in the Sacred Writings, is referred to the time of Darius the Persian; tho' comprehending a period far beyond the reign of that prince: a circumstance which has induced Sir Isaac Newton to suppose Darius the Persian to include Darius Nothus as well as Darius Codomannus: a theory by no means satisfactory, as it will not account for the silence of Scripture with regard to the intermediate princes, Artaxerxes Mnemon, Artaxerxes Ochus, and Arogus. The whole endeavours of the learned, indeed, to reconcile the Persian Kings of Scripture to the Persian Kings of the Greeks, appear only to be productive of embarrassment: but if the theory now proposed is found to be just, Of considering many of the Scripture names as mere royal titles, it will correspond perfectly with the sublime figurative language of the Sacred Writers, and pave the way for removing several perplexing difficulties. The only Babylonish and Persian princes found in the Bible are Nebu- chadnezzar, Evil Merodach, Balshazzar, Abasuerus, Darius the Mede, Coresh, and Darius the Persian: Artaxerxes is also mentioned in Nehe-miab. The first Babylonish prince corresponds exactly in name, era, and actions with the Persian historians. The next two are not named by them; being only in general considered as governors or feudatory princes under the Great King: and the others, I apprehend, are simply epithets, given indiscriminately to any of the Persian monarchs, like Cæsar or Czar in Europe. Abasuerus or Achasuerus has, in particular, been the subject of much etymological investigation. Sir Isaac Newton, by inadvertency, makes him, in one place, to be Cyaxares, and, in another, Xerxes. Archbishop Usher supposes him to be Darius Hystaspes; Scaliger, Xerxes; Josephus, the Septuagint, and Dr. Hyde, Artaxerxes Longimanus. Now each of these conjectures contradicts the other; and none of them co-incide with the common chronology of the Bible, excepting Usher. Four different princes are named; and a range is taken of 187 years: the reign of the first, according to Newton, commencing 611 years, and the last dying 424, B. C. As such disagreements amongst our most learned men, show clearly that the basis must be wrong, there can be no impropriety in adding one conjecture more; which is, That Abasuerus, like Darius, is not the name of any individual prince, but a title; and probably derived, by a very simple Persian etymology, from Chofru; which signifies a Great King. Chofru or Kai Chofru was the third prince of the Kaianian dynasty; whose successful wars against the Turanians or Scythians, the old hereditary enemies of Persia, had greatly extended and firmly established the empire. His reputation was high in Asia: he was almost adored by his subjects, and by after-generations. The names of distinguished men in the East, have frequently been assumed as titles by succeeding princes; and they have been often given to them by foreign nations, whether they assumed them or not. Many kings of the Ashkanian and Sassanian dynasties bore the name of this ancient Persian monarch, by way of adjunct or surname, as Chofru Parviz, or Chofru Nushirvan; and the Romans gave the name of Cosroes to almost every sovereign of the Sassanian race. That foreigners might, in older times, have done the same with respect to the Kaianian princes, is entirely consistent with probability: and upon this ground we shall obviate another difficulty, with regard to Abasuerus, which seems difficult to be reconciled on other principles; and furnishes, at the same time, a strong presumptive argument in support of the present theory. We find an Abasuerus in Esther, and an Abasuerus in Ezra. Now according to the common Scripture and Greek chronology, these cannot be the same individual prince. The marriage of the first with Esther is placed about the year 515, B. C. Cyrus, as before observed, died in 529, and Darius Hystaspes, succeeding Smerdis Magus in 521, reigned till 485. But in Ezra we find the succession to be Cyrus, Darius, and Abasuerus. This last prince must have reigned therefore after Darius, not earlier than 485; and could not reign likewise, cotemporary with him, in 515. Should the advocates for archbishop Usher's idea even insist, that, notwithstanding this passage, there was still but one Abasuerus; and that Abasuerus was Darius; for the sake of argument it might be granted, without weakening the hypothesis: as it would then demonstrate, that the same prince is called in the Bible both Darius and Abasuerus; and that they were consequently both royal titles, and indiscriminately used. It may perhaps be said, that if these were royal titles, the prefixing of Melech, or any similar word implying a sovereign, as King Darius, or King Abasuerus, would be a tautological redundancy. But that would be an objection of no weight, nothing being more common in the East: a famous prince in the eleventh century, amongst many instances, being called Sultan Malek Shah, which literally signifies King King King.

THE apparent conclusions to be drawn from the preceding observations, are, That the Greeks and Romans, in their ancient histories, especially of distant countries, are often wrong; and, in general, liable to suspicion: That their accounts of the East, as well with regard to manners, as historic facts, are inconsistent with the Asiatic authors; irreconcilable with Scripture; contradictory in themselves; and often impossible in nature: That as the later writers, Diodorus, Strabo, Plutarch, are often in complete opposition to the earlier historians, and complain of the repugnances with which they are every where perplexed, nothing can more strongly point to a fundamental error: That modern chronologers, commentators, and compilers of Ancient History, differ likewise greatly in opinion; supporting frequently their systems by points of a most doubtful complexion, and rejecting others of a far more probable appearance: That a resemblance of names is often preferred to a consistency in facts: That the inventions of superstition, or the fictions of poets, are often viewed as real events; and the same critical accuracy employed in fixing the early epochs of imaginary beings, as in resolving the most rational truths of more authentic times. That such being the uncertain basis of Ancient Story, no materials ought to be despised: That the Persian and Arabian historians are intitled to attention, in whatever regards their own countries; their relations being grounded at least on national belief; and national belief never originating without some foundation: That the mere priority in time of the Western to the Eastern writers, when unsupported by circumstances of higher evidence, should give no preference in regard to authority: as, upon the same principles, we might rank a Ctesias before Plutarch; a Roger de Hoveden before Hume; or a Gregory of Tours before De Thou: That we may perceive some strong lines of truth in the Eastern historians, from their concurrence with the Bible, in the few facts mentioned above: whilst even their silence on some heads, with their slight variation in others, furnish high presumption of their authenticity: for had they been exactly in conformity with the Scripture, we should naturally have concluded, that their materials had been borrowed from thence; and considered them merely in the light of translations. But the manner in which they are told shows, that the great lines were independently known in Persia; and that the difference is simply what might have been expected between Sacred Writers, who had every opportunity of information; and the annalists of another country, who neither had such advantages, nor were so deeply interested in the events. ^a

THE usefulness of the Arabic language, in the illustration of Scripture, has indeed long been generally acknowledged; whilst the Persian, little studied by the learned, has hardly ever been considered as an auxiliary in this important point. Yet when we reflect upon the intimate connection of a great part of the history of the Jews with that of Persia, it is difficult to account for this singular inattention upon any ground, but the supposition, That the old dialect of Persia is lost; and that the modern can give no assistance in remote enquiries. But this, as I have before observed, seems to be a surmise, unsupported by the slightest authority: the pure Persian now in use being evidently of very high antiquity; and apparently the chief language in which any thing Persian, worth preservation or recovery, has been written by the ancient natives: however it may have been disguised under a variety of perplexing characters, which few have given themselves the trouble to consider with attention. Should the Arabic and Persian languages ever become therefore, like the Greek and Latin, objects of general education; and learned men, freed from the fetters of prejudice, be once brought to suppose, that Grecian and Roman information may sometimes be assisted or corrected by a judicious study of Eastern authors, many discoveries must evidently be expected; which may furnish a variety of useful clues to the dark labyrinths of Ancient Mythology, History, and Manners. ^b

AMONGST other learned men who, apparently from an idea of their modern date, have disputed the utility of the Arabic and Persian languages, in the investigation of remote antiquity, is the ingenious author of A New System or Analysis of Ancient Mythology; a work in which the novel ingenuity of the Analytic System; the penetration and judgment displayed in the refutation of vulgar errors; with the new and informing light in which he has placed a variety of ancient facts; leaves the learned world only to regret, that this classical writer had not, to his singular knowledge in Greek and Roman literature, added some tincture of the languages and learning of the East. As there appears, however, to be an impropriety in any person's condemning what he confessedly does not understand; and as this learned gentleman has attacked a province, which I conceive it to be my duty to defend; I shall endeavour to remove some of the prejudices which he may have created: as the errors of a writer of uncommon abilities, who has laid down canons for future history, may have a more dangerous tendency than the mistakes of inferior men, whom few read, and still fewer follow. ^c

THE chief points, which Mr. Bryant means to establish, are, First, The universality of the deluge from gentile authorities. Secondly, The migration, after the Babel dispersion, of a people whom he calls Cuthites or Amonians, the descendants of Cbus the son of Ham. Thirdly, The Arkite ceremonials, with the general worship of the Sun and Fire, as introduced by those people into the different countries where they established colonies. ^d

Two great lines, our learned author observes, marked, in particular, the Amonian character; The monuments and rites which they every where instituted, as memorials of the Universal Deluge; and The proofs they every where left of their idolatrous worship of the Sun and Fire. With regard to the first great event, I shall only observe, in general, that the departing from the Sacred Writings, to prove the destruction of mankind by Pagan authorities, however laudable the intention, seems first to shake to the foundations the venerable fabrick, and then to prop it with a bullrush. For, where recourse is had to feeble and imperfect evidence, a cause must ever be hurt in proportion to its failure. Yet, as if truth wanted the aid of fiction, innumerable have been the attempts of the learned to establish, by forced and unnatural construction, a conformity between the early history of the Hebrews and the later fables of Greece, Egypt, and other ancient nations. From the fragments of Berosus, Abydenus, Sanconiathon, Manetho, and other remote fablers, any thing, and every thing, may indeed be drawn, which a lively imagination can suggest; but the working up of such strange materials into any circumstance descriptive of Noah's deluge, shews a warmth of fancy highly prepared for the reception of every thing marvellous; whilst, giving them all their utmost force, they prove, at last, precisely nothing: for ingenious men, if resolved to apply to profane materials in support of Scripture, ought to go to mountainous districts, and to countries far removed from the possibility of natural inundations: they ought to consider Hindostan, and other quarters of the world, where they positively refuse to believe this important era. Testimonies from such regions would be far more conclusive than hundreds of volumes from Egypt and Chaldea. The periodical overflowings of the Nile, it is easy to imagine, might have proved fatal to the first inhabitants of Egypt, till experience had taught them to guard against its inundations; whilst the terror naturally filling the minds of rude men, who, with difficulty, had escaped a deluge in which their dearest friends had perished, might easily give rise to ten times more superstitious rites than ever investigation has discovered in ancient Egypt. The same arguments will hold with equal force, in regard to the still darker glimmerings from Babylonia; where mounds, canals, and all the efforts of the ruling powers for thousands of years, have not been able to prevent the sudden desolation which the Euphrates and Tigris have often spread around. To advance, in short, as proofs of an universal deluge, such ceremonies as the processions of Egyptian priests, with a boat and a strange figure, appears to be equally unsatisfactory, as the demonstration of a general destruction by fire would have been, from observations on the environs of Mounts Vesuvius or Ætna.

THE next point, in relation to the Cuthite or Amonian worship of the Sun and Fire, I shall consider, with more attention; as the strongest arguments seem naturally to spring from the subject, to demonstrate the usefulness of the Arabic and the Persian languages, in relation to the history and mythology of ancient times; and show convincingly, at the same time, that the most intimate acquaintance with the literature of Greece and Rome will lead the greatest critical acumen but a little way without such assistance. To make the subsequent observations more intelligible, it will be proper to give two extracts from the learned author's preface, which will fully show the ground-work of his ingenious hypothesis. "It is necessary for me to acquaint the reader, that the wonderful people, to whom I allude, were the descendants of Chus; and called Cuthites and Cuseans. They stood their ground at the general migration of families: but were at last scattered over the face of the earth. They were the first apostates from the truth; yet great in worldly wisdom. They introduced, wherever they came, many useful arts; and were looked up to, as a superior order of beings: hence they were stiled Heroes, Demons, Heliadæ, Macarians. They were joined in their expeditions by other nations; especially by the collateral branches of their family, the Mizraim, Caphtorim, and the sons of Canaan. These were all of the line of Ham, who was held, by his posterity, in the highest veneration. They called him Amon: and having, in process of time, raised him to a divinity, they worshipped him as the sun: and from this worship they were stiled Amonians."—"Most ancient names, not only of places but of persons, have a manifest analogy; there is likewise a great correspondence to be observed in terms of science, and in the titles which were, of old, bestowed upon magistrates and rulers. The same observation may be extended even to plants and minerals, as well as to animals, especially to those which were esteemed at all sacred; their names seem to be composed of the same or similar elements, and bear a manifest relation to the religion in use among the Amonians, and to the deity whom they adored. This deity was the sun; and most of the ancient names will be found to be an assemblage of titles bestowed upon that luminary. In consequence of this, I have ventured to give a list of some Amonian terms, which occur in the mythology of Greece and in the histories of other nations. Most ancient names seem to have been composed out of these elements; and into the same principles they may be again resolved by an easy and fair evolution. I subjoin to these a short interpretation, and, at the same time, produce different examples of names and titles, which are thus compounded. From hence the reader will see plainly my method of analysis, and the basis of my etymological enquiries."

THUS has this learned gentleman created a people to fill up every chasm of high antiquity, and to account for all the phenomena of early population, history, and superstition. As the Sacred Writings however afford no lights to trace the wanderings of this extraordinary family; and as all his gleanings from profane tradition might with equal force, in the same ingenious hands, prove Confucius to be William the Conqueror, his proofs, à priori, seem to amount to nothing; the great weight of his evidence resting chiefly on the ground of etymological deduction. Such being the station he has chosen to controvert the systems of all preceding writers, and to fix the principles of all succeeding history, it could have been wished, that the most unquestioned strength had marked his fundamental axioms; that the definitions of his elementary particles had been precisely fixed; that the languages, whence he has drawn the meanings he has annexed, had been distinctly specified; and that not a doubt should have been left upon the reader's mind with regard to the great basis upon which this fabrick stands. But on this leading point, assertion seems too often to have usurped the province of proof: of above forty radicals, a half at least do not appear to approach the senses he has given them: whilst misled by his ear and his eye, he has fancied analogies, which the languages will not bear; and drawn conclusions, to which the premises seem compleatly foreign. *

ONE great endeavour of our learned author is to trace to his Cuthites the origin of Solar and Igneous worship: and, in order to fix this theorem, he brings forward a number of particles, which, he says, in ancient times signified the Sun or Fire. As he seldom mentions, however, in what particular idiom they were received in those senses, doubts naturally arise. To the Sun, as a mere astronomical body, or to the Fire, as a simple element, few of them appear to bear the most remote relation: and, in any other sense, descriptive of them as objects of adoration, they might, with equal propriety, be adduced to authenticate the worship of the Egyptian Onion, the Druids Oak, or the great Arabian Stone Devil in the valley of Mouna. For how far they may have been figuratively applied, will prove only the traces of general superstition, without pointing either to the nature, origin, or votaries of any particular mode of worship; because great, glorious, and such epithets, which some of those words imply, may have been indiscriminately bestowed upon every stock or stone which the folly of man has, at any time, thought proper to treat with respect. †

THE first of those particles which I shall take notice of, is el or al. In Hebrew, Arabic, and Persian, this word has many different meanings; and, amongst others, signifies a god: but without the least authority to suppose that it ever had any particular affinity to the Sun. In a variety of instances, however, it is merely the Arabic article the; as Elain The fountain, Elaur The fire, Ain al sham The Fountain of Syria (not, the Fountain of the Sun); El said The Prince, &c. (and not the Saïte prince). "The deity El, Mr. Bryant says, "was particularly invoked by the Eastern nations, when they made an attack in battle: "at such time they used to cry out El-el and " Al-al. This Mohammed could not bring his "profelytes to leave off, and therefore changed "it to Allab." But this appears to have no foundation, and the learned gentleman produces no proof. I have not been able to discover, that the Arabians ever entertained the least partiality for El, as a divinity: nor is the name even to be found amongst the numerous idols worshipped by the different tribes; a circumstance extremely improbable, had it ever been remarkable as an object of their invocation. Allab, on the contrary, is a word of much antiquity, and was certainly in use among the Arabians long before the era of Mohammed. I shall mention one unquestionable authority. The prince Amralkeis, a cotemporary of Mohammed, was one of the most celebrated of the Arabian poets; and the author of one of the famous poems, formerly mentioned, called Moallakat; which, on account of their superior excellence, were hung up in the temple of Mecca. In this poem Allab occurs; where it never could have appeared, had it been an innovation of Mohammed. Two reasons seem to be conclusive; first, The rooted aversion and contempt that prince ever entertained for the prophet and his religion, which would have made him despise the idea of adopting any thing originating from him; and, secondly, The certainty that this poem must have been written, and suspended in the Kaaba, before Mohammed's public appearance; or at least before he had obtained influence sufficient with the Arabians, to make them depart from established usages: for after he had got that Temple into his power, we find no more poems hung up there. To have admitted any thing indeed into that sacred fabric, which supported not the new religion, would have been considered as a high profanation: and we cannot surely suppose, that the productions of a professed pagan, a personal enemy to the prophet, and an open scoffer at the Moslem faith, should have met with that favour which was denied from this period to all the world. Another proof that Allab was of old used for Omnipotence amongst the Arabians, may be drawn from the following circumstances. The chief religion that prevailed in this country, before the Mohammedan, was the Sabian: which inculcated a belief in one Supreme Deity; in the stars and angels, as his subordinates; and in idols, as their representatives. Of those idols the principal was Allat, or Alibet (the feminine of Allah), whom they considered as the eldest daughter of God; and worshipped, in that character, with the highest degree of devotion. If the Arabians had therefore any species of war-cry before their prophet's era, it was probably either Allab, which they still use, or Allat, their favourite goddess; both of which are derived from a root totally dissimilar to El. Was any further argument necessary, to prove that this was no introduction of the Arabian lawgiver, the silence of the Alcoran would alone, perhaps, be sufficient: for had this cry ever prevailed, and had it ever been considered as an object of alteration by Mohammed, it must have been mentioned in that book: there being no point to which the prophet was more strictly attentive than to introduce into it, by the pretended ministry of the angel Gabriel, every innovation, however trifling, which he judged proper to make, in the religion, laws, and manners of his countrymen : in order to gain respect, and secure obedience to his mandates ; which, by this device, he persuaded his followers, were the immediate dictates of heaven. *

On, or eon, is said to be an Egyptian name of the Sun ; and for this we have the authority of the priest Manetho, as quoted by Eusebius and Theophilus. I shall not dispute it, but only observe, that every thing relative to the old Egyptians is so strangely involved in hieroglyphic darkness and absurdity, that we know little which bears the semblance of probability, with regard to their history, their religion, or their language. The kahens, or priests, it appears, had a mysterious character of their own ; and as every expression of common sense seems to have been considered by them as dangerous to their power, by removing the barrier of superstition from between them and the people, symbols, which meant any thing and nothing, were used as the only medium of religious communication. The rude and hideous hieroglyphics on their obelisks, have no analogy to those of any people in the world ; nor has enquiry fixed the most remote resemblance between their sacred dialect and that of any adjacent state. To build therefore Syrian, Chaldean, or Phrygian rites, dignities, and cities, on Egyptian foundations, appears, at best, a most suspicious ground, and certainly very unfit to bear a superstructure of any magnitude. †

THE Etymological combinations and derivatives from Ham, the son of the patriarch Noah, and the supposed progenitor of the Cuthite family, are introduced, in a variety of lights, as great authorities in support of the existence of this uncommon people ; and of the adoration of the Sun and Fire, which they are said to have so universally propagated. But on this head I have many doubts. Ham, in the Hebrew as well as in the Arabic, is spelt with a letter, the true pronunciation of which is a strong aspiration, resembling h in Hound. Wherever Europeans have therefore written it Cham, it must apparently have proceeded either from inadvertency, or to accommodate it to a similar sound in their own languages. The Germans and Dutch, in particular, will ever adopt this mode, because they universally give ch a strong guttural pronunciation ; but in English and other languages it seems to be wrong ; as this Eastern word can never, with propriety, be pronounced like character ; but precisely as Hound above-mentioned, or as Ham, the manner in which it has been uniformly and judiciously expressed by the translators of our English Bible. The combinations in which hard Ch or C is introduced, appear, for these reasons, to have no natural concern with the name of the patriarch ; and must, if they have any meaning, be looked for in various and very distinct roots ; though chance and corruption may possibly, after all, lay a stronger claim to the far greater number, than the most ingenious analysis can trace to a more legitimate origin. It may be said indeed, and with truth, that some nations have universally given the hard sound of ch to this letter ; the Italians in particular writing and pronouncing Mohammed Machomete. But this is evidently a corruption : corruptions are not uniform ; Persians, Syrians, Greeks, indeed all nations, corrupt differently. Yet Mr. Bryant brings names from China to Rome, beginning with hard C and Ch : and all of them, he says, derived from Ham : but till it can be demonstrated, that these various nations, dissimilar in almost every point of view, are, nevertheless, uniform in their mode of corrupting foreign words, we shall hardly be induced to believe, that those names challenge an origin from one common radical word.—Amon or Omanus, and similar names which he also deduces from Ham, seem, if possible, to be still more vague. The Hebrew and the Arabic differ remarkably in their formation from most other tongues. In these the alphabets are divided into certain letters, which they call radicals, and serviles. The first are as essential to the texture of a word, as the head is to the human body : and excepting in position, must ever remain unaltered ; conjugation, declension, with every species of inflexion, derivation, and composition, being performed by the intermediation of the serviles. As these are placed not only at the beginning and end of words, but also in the middle, the radicals are consequently often separated ; and they are sometimes transposed ; but to omit any of those indispensable letters, or to add a radical to a root already complete, is absolutely inconsistent with the genius of the tongues ; and wholly destructive of the words : as either depriving them altogether of sense, or giving them meanings incompatible with the intrinsic significations of their themes. Now the initial h in Ham is a radical letter : to remove it, is precisely removing the whole word ; Amon, on those principles, can apparently have no reference to the son of Noah ; and every conclusion drawn from the Amonian appellation of the Cuthite people, seems to be a foundation by far too slight to support the edifice, which the learned gentleman has erected. ‡

Ait, we are next told, is the Sun ; but still without mentioning in what dialect. Ait, in Hebrew and Arabic, signifies a sign, wonder, miracle, &c. and in this sense Ait-el, (which, according to Mr. Bryant, implies Deus Sol) may be rendered The wonderful God ; and Ait-ur, The miraculous fire, instead of The fire or heat of the Sun. Athyr, one of the old Egyptian months, of Chaldean extraction, which he derives from this combination, seems however to come from a different origin ; and to be the same with the Persian Azyr or azer, which signifies Fire, lightning, the Angel of fire; and also a month, which corresponded anciently with March, and now with November. That the Chaldeans and Persians had many words in common, is unquestionable; whilst the difference of pronunciation is nothing but what is usual in every word where such letters are found; the Jews, the Arabians, and probably the Egyptians, giving uniformly the hard sound t'h, dh, ds, &c. to those characters which the Persians have ever softened into z or s.

As, is, or ees, is also said to be the Sun. In Hebrew, as undoubtedly denotes Fire; and may, possibly, have been figuratively applied to the Star of Day: I shall here confine my observations therefore to some mistakes into which Mr. Bryant has been apparently led by a similarity of sounds. "As, he says, is sometimes compounded with itself, and rendered afas and azaz," and thence he draws a variety of conclusions, as if the combinations from afas or afis, and azaz or aziz, were deducible from the same original: but Cicero and Scanderbeg are not more distinct than the roots from whence they spring; the first implying, in Hebrew, as before observed, Fire; and, in Arabic, A foundation, origin, first principle; the other denoting Glory, dignity, power, &c.: whilst the initial letters are, at the same time, not only quite different, but s and z, however interchangeable sometimes in other languages, (as patronize, patronise; authorize, authorise, in English), are equally remote, in the Eastern dialects, from promiscuous use, as the most opposite sounding characters in the alphabet. Ateff Fire, it may also be remarked, can never possibly be derived from ad-is, the radicals being totally irreconcilable; an objection that indeed may be made to the names of almost all the countries, temples, lakes, and fountains, which, by combination, transposition, and fancied analogy, he lays down, as originating from as or az.

San, son, zan, zaan, Mr. Bryant says, was the most common name for the Sun; but in what Eastern dialect we are not informed. Upon this ground, he observes, however, that the Indian Hercules, or the Greek Dorfanos, was an abridgement of Adorfan; which he interprets Lord of light: but we have no proof that ador ever signified a Lord, or san the Sun or Light. Ador may be translated in Arabic The power of fire: but I would rather suppose it to be the same as the Persian Azer (Fire) mentioned above; for, by the difference of pointing, or provincial pronunciation, it may be sounded azor, azer, azyr, ador, &c. San, when subjoined to nouns in the Persian language, implies similitude; Adorfan or Azerfan signifies therefore resembling fire, splendid, bright; and, consequently, it may, with propriety, have been applied as an epithet or attribute to a deity. Barfanes, an ancient king of Armenia, is also said to denote Barfan, or offspring of the Sun; yet still as we dispute san's relation to the sun, it is impossible to admit it. Bar, as an adjunct, denotes a country, as Malabar, Tranquebar, &c. it also implies great, elevated; and, in that sense, is often joined with the name of God: San signifies dignity, grandeur, honour, &c. A combination of such terms may naturally furnish good etymological grounds for religious or royal titles, without any relation to the sun: but I will go a little farther, and just hint, that Barfan may be corrupted from Barzan or Berzin, which in Persian denotes Fire, a temple of fire, a chief priest of fire; and absolutely the name of the reputed founder of the first temple of fire in Armenia: in which country, by Grecian as well as Eastern tradition, this mode of worship is said to have originally commenced; and to have been carried from thence by Zoroaster into Persia. As the king was often, at the same time, high priest, the proposed etymology may not, perhaps, be altogether ideal.

Ast, asta, esta, hestia, signified, our learned author says, the Fire, or the deity of that element; but still we are left in the dark with regard to the tongue. On this supposition, however, he disputes an etymology of Dr. Hyde with respect to Istakbar or Persopolis; and I must venture to differ not only from both, but even from the Farhang Jehangiri. The learned Doctor imagines this city to have been named from a palace or temple hewn out of a Rock; and derives it, in consequence, from the eighth conjugation of an Arabic verb, which has a reference to Stones. The derivation is sufficiently vague in any point of view; but the tracing it to an Arabic origin seems to destroy it at once. It is not till the seventh century of the Christian era, as before observed, that we are to look for the introduction of Arabic words into the Persian language; whilst Istakbar is a city of such high antiquity, that the origin is lost in uncertainty and fiction. King Gemshid is the historical founder of it: Romance carries it beyond Adam, and ascribes it to Jan ben Jan, the king of the Genii: the one indeed may be as fabulous as the other, but they both incontestibly prove its extreme antiquity. To suppose then, that the Persians, who appear, in all ages, to have been remarkably attentive to give every place a name, in their own tongue, expressive of some peculiar quality, or commemorative of some great event, should, on the foundation of their metropolis, their chief temple, or their royal palace, have recourse to a language, they apparently knew nothing of; and spoken by a people whose political consequence could then intitle them to no superior respect; appears equally visionary as hunting for the etymologies of London or Paris in the dialects of China.

Japan. Mr. Bryant is led to question this derivation, but upon grounds I am afraid more refined than solid. "I am entirely a stranger" (says he) to the Persian and Arabic languages; "yet I cannot acquiesce in his opinion."

"The place, to be sure, is built of stone taken from a quarry or rock: but what temple or palace is not?" This reasoning does not seem conclusive; for, were there not, even in England, numberless palaces and churches built of materials very different from stone, the caprice of founders cannot always be accounted for: and he might, with the same force of argument, dispute the existence of Civita vecchia, or Newcastle; because all cities must, in time, grow old, and every castle must have once been new. But the interpretation which this objection is meant to introduce, stands upon a bottom by no means more substantial; for where does Esta signify fire, and char a palace or a temple? Not apparently in the Persian, to which alone we ought to look for the etymon of a Persian metropolis: and this idea has accordingly been followed by the author of the Farhang, who deduces it from a word, which in that language signifies a large cistern or tank hollowed out of the rock: but this derivation appears also to be exceptionable; as every circumstance of likelihood will lead us rather to imagine, that the cistern, instead of bestowing a name, received its own à posteriori from the temple; to which it was not only inferior in importance, but subsequent probably in point of time: whilst the sacred application of its waters, to some of the higher mysteries of their religion, might soon cause the name universally to prevail, and to denote, in general, any similar reservoir of water. Having thus differed from such respectable authorities, I shall now proceed to hazard two etymologies, which have at least the appearance of standing upon a broader and more simple basis. Ista denotes a place, station, dwelling (from the Persian verb Istaden, To stand, remain, dwell); Khur or Khar signifies the Sun: whence Istakhar will naturally imply, the place or temple of the Sun. Ista, esta, or asta, means also praise (from the verb sutuden); and, in this sense, the combination of these words will express Praise of the Sun: both of which interpretations seem to be unforced; and highly characteristic of the capital and chief temple of an empire, where, from time immemorial, the Sun had been the great ostensible object of adoration.

Shem, shamen, and shemesb, we are next told, are terms relative to the Heavens and to the Sun; and here we have Hebrew authority: but every conclusion the learned gentleman has formed, from the premises, is another demonstrative proof, how much in the dark the best judgment must wander, when building upon etymological definitions, without a knowledge of the languages whence the information should be drawn. Samos, Samothrace, Samora, and such like names, if they are of Eastern extraction, must flow from very different roots: whilst the chief point he endeavours to fix, that Syria from its name, was particularly devoted to Solar worship, falls to the ground; neither of the names, Sham nor Syria having any reference to the Sun. Sham, by which that country is most generally known to the Asiatics, is a root so little connected with the Hebrew Shemesb or the Arabic Shems, that no inflexions of those languages can ever possibly produce the most remote analogy. Sham, Shamet, or Shamé (and with the article Eshsham or Eshshamé) implies Black, a black mole upon the face, the left hand, &c. and this last signification is that which is in general received by the Arabians and the Syrians themselves: a name, they say, this country obtained, at the same time that Arabia Felix was called Yemen, which implies the right hand; the one lying to the right and the other to the left of the Kaaba, or temple of Mecca. This is the derivation adopted, in particular, yet with some doubt, by the celebrated Sultan Abulfeda, who reigned in Syria about the middle of the fourteenth century; and wrote, in Arabic, an Universal History, and a System of Geography. Upon this etymology, Mr. Bryant observes, "Abulfeda supposes, that Syria is called Scham quasi sinistra. It was called Sham for the same reason that it was called Syria. Συρος γὰρ ὁ ἡλῖος the same as Σεριος. Persæ Συρη Deum vocant."—"Syria is called at this day Souristan. Souris from Sehor, Sol, Σεριος of Greece." But here, instead of correcting one error, our learned author has made two; because were there even such a word in Persian, as above asserted, denoting the Sun, the Asiatics would hardly write Souri or Souristan from the root Sehor; as h is a radical, and cannot be dispensed with. Abulfeda's etymology obviously rejects the Sun; as a man of his learning and penetration could not possibly have been perplexed about the origin of his kingdom's name, had he seen any rational ground of derivation from that luminary: yet it must be confessed, that the idea which he has followed, unless more exactly defined, is by no means convincing; for neither Yemen nor Sham appear to have any positive relation in point of Right or Left to the Kaaba; which must depend entirely upon the position a person may take when considering this temple. If you view it towards the north, these countries are undoubtedly found in the above positions; but turning towards the south, they are reversed; and in the Eastern and Western directions they are neither right nor left.—With regard to Syria I shall here hazard an etymology, which, whether it may be esteemed just or not, flows at least from the simple untortured meaning of the word. This country has been ever famed for roses; the Damasc rose is celebrated even by our English poets. Suri in Persian denotes a species of this flower, beautiful in colour and delicate in smell: Suristan, or the land of roses, might consequently, with much propriety, have been given by the Persians, to a country which produced them in such perfection and abundance. Stan or istan, the adjunct, is, like our shire, sometimes added, sometimes dropt; Fars or Faristan, Suri or Suristan, being indifferently used, as we say Wilts or Wiltshire. Συρια is therefore pure Persian, with the Greek termination; and through this medium comes our Syria substituting only y for the Greek u upon the same principles with other similar words adopted from that tongue (as system from Συστημα), the English pronunciation having no sound precisely corresponding with the Greek ypsilon. Having had occasion to mention stan or istan above, it may not be improper to point out some mistaken conclusions which Mr. Bryant has drawn from this termination. “Tin, he observes, “signified a kind of high altar; that it prevailed amongst the ancient Etrurians; that it formed the compounds Numantinus, Palatinus, Aventinus; and that it appears to be the same “with tan in the East, which occurs occasionally in “Mogulis-tan, Indos-tan, Pharfis-tan, Chufis-tan.” In regard to the Roman examples, it seems to be straining, to the utmost, etymological refinement, to make any thing more of them than mere possessive adjectives; as these names appear to have no more title to any meaning of mystery, than Alexandrine from Alexander, legatine from legat: but with respect to the Asiatic illustrations, which he has produced in support of this ingenious theory, they have positively not the least foundation; neither tan nor tin, in this sense, being even known in any Eastern dialect, as will be more fully explained in the notes.*

As I apprehend enough will appear, in the foregoing observations, to point out the comprehensive utility of the Arabic and Persian languages in every discussion of high antiquity: and as this preliminary dissertation is merely designed to touch generally upon such topics as may have a tendency to throw light upon the subject at large; the bounds and intention of this sketch will not permit me to enter into a more minute investigation of Mr. Bryant’s very learned and valuable work. Some slight observations on other particles will be found in the notes; and with them I shall, for the present, close my philological remarks. I wish, however, it may not be understood, that I place any uncommon weight on the definitions which I have any where offered; by supposing them to be the positive origin of the proper names to which they are applied. My chief purpose has been simply to show, that the significations brought from the Arabic and Persian languages are expressive; and may easily, without violence, justify a possibility of their having been so employed. But I am too sensible of the uncertainty which must always accompany every similar conjecture, to consider them on higher ground than points of mere curiosity, and incentives to deeper investigation. How many obscure circumstances, known only to the founders, have concurred in giving names to places? How difficult it is to determine, whether they were denominated from Chiefs, from Events, or from Peculiar Qualities of Situation? and how many have derived names from more Ancient Structures, to which they bore a resemblance merely in some subordinate circumstance; that left not a ray to trace the great original meaning? Innumerable examples might be brought; but I shall confine myself to one obvious instance. The Pantheon of Rome was dedicated To all the Gods; and its Grecian name was perfectly descriptive of the design. Its architecture was pleasing; future artists admired it; and domes arose in distant countries consecrated to any thing but gods. What a noble field of critical investigation might not the Pantheons of the Escorial and of London furnish, therefore, to antiquaries, two thousand years hence; could we suppose, for a moment, the Pantheon of Agrippa to be forgotten; and the languages and history of Greece and Rome to be then as completely involved in darkness, as those of high antiquity are to the researches of modern times.†

UPON the whole, an able general will make admirable dispositions even on bad grounds. Mr. Bryant’s arguments will ever command respect; but the stations he has chosen must, in my humble opinion, baffle all his skill to defend. Without an acquaintance with those Eastern tongues, all analysis of Eastern names must be completely fanciful: for whilst numbers of words, which may be expressed perfectly alike in European characters, have roots and meanings totally different; others, which, in the eye of a stranger to the dialects, may bear no resemblance, will claim the same radical origin, and possess little variation of sense. Widely differing, therefore, as those Eastern inflexions are from the genius of European tongues, it must be evident, even to those who have never made them an object of study, that the same principles which might guide an enquirer through the etymologies of the one class, must, in general, palpably mislead his researches in the other. It will hardly be considered, at the same time, as a substantial ground of defence, for this ingenious gentleman, to advance arguments, similar to those he has already used in respect to the Hebrew: “I do “not, says he, deduce them (i. e. etymologies) “from the Hebrew. And though there may “have been, of old, a great similitude between “that language and those of Egypt, Cutha, and “Canaan : yet they were all different tongues. “There was once but one language among the “sons of men.”—Let it be admitted, that there was one great original language, whence the Hebrew, the Arabic, and all the lost and living dialects of antiquity were descended ; is it not rational to conclude, that a considerable part of those tongues, which still exist, did actually pre-exist in that aboriginal language : and that the variety of lost idioms, which, in early times, prevailed in Lower Asia and Egypt, were either the immediate derivatives from that language, or dialects of its most diffusive branches. Those tongues in particular which Mr. Bryant mentions, if they ever did live, have certainly long since expired : where then shall we search for a discovery of their characteristic traces ? where but in the Hebrew, in the Arabic, in the Syriac, in the Persian : which were unquestionably spoken in the same or in the surrounding countries ; and either gave them birth, were derived from them, or claimed one common source. Can any stronger presumption be furnished of the truth or probability of this position, with regard especially to the Arabic and the Persian, than the unconstrained meanings, which have been brought from those languages, for almost every radical particle, chosen by this learned gentleman, as the basis of his system ? Could this be the effect of chance ? Is it not a striking proof of their antiquity and utility ? And do not such etymons carry far more forcible conviction to our understanding, than dark and unsatisfactory derivation from unknown tongues ? A system of evidence, which proves either too much or nothing at all : for if one writer is allowed to roam through the regions of fancy, and fix arbitrary interpretations to a favourite class of words, another and another have an equal right : and every ingenious critic may then, like Archimedes of old, require only some transmundane station on which to rear his engines ; in order to shake to pieces the reason of man, as that famous Syracusan boasted he could have done our globe, had another world been found on which to fix his great mechanic powers. *

To touch slightly on the extensive subject of Eastern manners ; and to trace, in a few instances, their probable influence on those of modern Europe, will now be the subject of a short enquiry. I am sensible that we may refine too much, by deriving every resemblance of customs, in one country, from the apparent counter part in another. In different quarters of the world, a similarity of habit has been discovered amongst people, in other respects wholly dissimilar : and mankind, in parallel situations, will often think alike, without the least communication of sentiment. We may not, at the same time, reason always justly, in looking only to the era of great events for the influx of novel customs. We are stunned by the rolling of a torrent, whilst the humbler stream glides unnoticed by ; and many circumstances may have been placed to the account of revolution and conquest, which possibly originated from simpler causes, and flowed in by less perceptible channels. How far the following theory may be found just, will depend therefore upon its probable co-incidence with the history and habits of mankind : in such remote enquiries we can hardly hope for more. *

ROMANTIC Fiction has long been considered as of Eastern origin ; and, to fix the period of its introduction into Europe, has given rise to many systems. The Saracen Conquest of Spain, and the Cruzades, have been chiefly built upon ; and the hypothesis of Oden's flight from the Euxine to Scandinavia, has of late been adopted, by an intelligent and pleasing writer, to account for its early prevalence amongst our Gothic ancestors. It is certainly evident, that not only Romance, but many customs and modes of thinking, apparently Asiatic, were found amongst those fierce invaders, before their irruption into the Roman empire : yet, as there is no probability in the tale of Oden, I shall, after assigning a few reasons for refusing my assent to this wonderful expedition, hazard some conjectures on the channels, through which those characteristic Eastern manners may possibly have flowed into our Western regions. :

MANY learned Northern Antiquaries, from traditions in old Runic poems, and other suspicious materials, have framed a historical system with regard to their great hero Oden ; which, though evidently intended to heighten the character of that famous Scandinavian lawgiver, proves the most severe of satires. Oden, they say, was the chief of a Sarmatian tribe, inhabiting the banks of the Lake Meotis ; or, according to others, the country between the Euxine and Caspian Seas, now called Gurjestan or Georgia ; who, terrified at the progress of the Roman arms, after the defeat of Mithridates by Pompey, abandoned his country, at the head of a great body of his people, and settled in Denmark, Norway, Sweden, and other Scandinavian districts : where he laid the foundations of that power, which, in after-ages, overwhelmed the Roman empire. But if the Palus Meotis is fixed as the dominions of Oden, even the din of war could hardly have reached his ear : whilst the impression made upon the countries between the seas was too slight to have alarmed the most effeminate of nations. Pompey was but a short time at Colchis : Mithridates had fled before his arrival. The conquest of that country was not his object : he had more important views. He left it almost immediately ; and marched against Tigranes into Armenia. The Iberians and Albanians, the old inhabitants of Georgia, instead of flying, laid many ambuscades to harass him. On the defeat of Tigranes, he returned to chastise those people for daring to insult the Roman arms. They again opposed him; but afterwards sued for peace; which he granted, without any severity of condition. Pompey proceeded immediately against the Syrians and Medes; and we hear of him no more in those parts. The Romans, unlike the barbarian invaders of their empire, who marked their route with desolation, though an ambitious, were by no means a cruel enemy. A nominal obedience to the senate was often all they required, from those districts in particular which skirted their dominions: and protection was ever the reward of submission. Whence then could originate a terror so dreadful, as to frighten a people not completely pusillanimous from a country hardly attacked; capable of great natural defence; intersected in various directions by rugged mountains and extensive forests; and hurry them from the mild latitude of 42, to the degree of 57 north: a region to them unknown; barren, bleak, and of a severity of climate, which, even now, with all the advantage of cultivation, must chill to inaction the constitution of a Southern Asiatic? Would it not have been flying, at the same time, from the mere echo of war, to encounter difficulties almost unfurmountable? To have pierced to the frozen latitude of Scandinavia, over mountains, and rivers, and seas; through woods, and marshes, and hardy savages; implies a degree of persevering intrepidity, widely differing from that abject timidity which first induced them to fly. There is a striking difference, let it be remembered, between emigration and flight; between the enthusiasm and animation which must possess a body of adventurers departing in quest of plunder and new discoveries, and the trembling fugitives from imaginary alarms. A fearlessness of danger will distinguish the first; a wretched despondency will mark the others. Yet in this tale, those opposite characters must have been found in the same people; and Oden and his tribe, from despicable cowards, must suddenly have been transformed to paragons of heroism. But nature rejects the idea; and History should reject it too. We err when we take it from the province of Romance. We ought to consider it in the light of a mere Scaldic fable, invented to trace the origin of Gothic and Roman enmity; as the far more probable fiction of Dido and Æneas was supposed to account for the irreconcilable antipathy between Rome and Carthage. The epoch of the expedition seems, at the same time, to bring Oden too far down. He is celebrated as a deity in Runic Odes of very ancient date. The Gods of every barbarous country are generally carried up to the highest periods of society. The era of this personage, whether real or imaginary, must apparently be of more remote antiquity. A mere modern would hardly have been the object of such early and enthusiastic worship.

THE great Officina gentium, whence such myriads of barbarians have at different periods poured into the more cultivated regions of the earth, appears, with every probability, to have been Tartary: though our greatest writers, following Jordanes, the Gothic abridger of Cassiodorus, have looked only to Scandinavia, and the Northern parts of Germany, for those bodies of fierce warriors, who, in the early ages of Christianity, overturned the government, and changed the manners of Europe. The Tartars, Scythians, or Turanians, (under which general names the historians of different nations have comprehended the inhabitants of that immense tract, stretching from 53° to 130° East long. and from about 39° to 80° North. lat.) have from the oldest times been remarked for a roving, irregular, martial life. People, whose riches centered in cattle, who wandered for pasture from district to district, could in consequence have no attachment to a spot. That amor patriæ, so conspicuous in the Hottentot, in the Laplander, and in the wild inhabitant of every barren rock, has never been discovered in men of this description. Attached to his tribe, and glorying in an extensive line of ancestors, the natale solum is to the Tartar an object of the most perfect indifference; and to abandon it, in the company of his friends, a circumstance rather of choice than regret. These great outlines have accordingly marked the operations of this extraordinary people from the most ancient times. Without those restraints on matrimony, which are found in more civilized communities, their numbers had naturally a prodigious increase; and as they despised the idea of cultivating the ground, the same extent of country which could have maintained thousands of husbandmen, was found often insufficient for hundreds of roaming pastors. Emigrations alone could remedy this inconvenience. A celebrated warrior had only to proclaim, therefore, his intention of invading some neighbouring state or more distant country. He was immediately joined by the chiefs of many hords. Chance, oftner than design, might shape their course; to the South, to the North, to the East, to the West; for every quarter of the globe has at different times been the theatre of Tartar establishment or plunder. The ancient annals of the Persians are entirely employed in commemorating their numerous wars with the Turanians beyond the Gihon. China and Hindostan have often felt their fury. Whilst Jengiz Khan and Tamerlane, at the head of their bold and hardy subjects, approached nearer to universal monarchy than any conquerors of ancient or modern times.

THAT the West must have been the object of Tartar invasion, as well as the East and South, there can be little ground to question. These people possess, as we may observe, the whole interior almost of the Asiatic and European continent. In a constant state of action and reaction, history informs us, that they have burst repeatedly upon every adjacent country. Like subterraneous vapours, when rarified beyond a certain degree, they have at times acquired a great expansive force; and the violence of the explosion in one part, would be generally in the ratio of the resistance in others. In the vigour of the Roman and Persian powers, they were often repulsed from their frontiers; but they would not always return. Without success, without plunder, that would have been an indelible disgrace. They might then have struck to the West or to the North, where, finding countries more thinly peopled; and the few inhabitants, not only strangers to the art of war, but unprotected by fortified towns, the opposition they might encounter, would in general be insufficient to check their progress. Yet meeting with no rich spoils in those countries, which could give a splendor to their expedition amongst their countrymen, they would often be induced rather to settle in their conquests than to go back: and as there would be sufficient territory for the invaders and the invaded, enmity would soon give way to intermarriages and social intercourse. The old inhabitants would adopt by degrees some of the manners and beliefs of the Eastern strangers; and these, in return, falling in with habits and ideas peculiar to the aboriginal people, a few generations would naturally incorporate them; and form in time those various nations, known by the names of Goths, Vandals, Lombards, Franks; whose roaming, rapacious, Tartar genius, became afterwards conspicuous, in the destruction of the Roman empire. No solid objection, it may be here observed, against those ancient Tartar invasions, can be built upon the silence of history; as this silence is the natural consequence of the unlettered manners both of the conquerors and the vanquished: and whilst the shocks were too remote to be felt in the more civilized states of Europe, we cannot hope to find them in their annals. Tartary, China, or Ton-queen, may possibly, even in the present times, be the theatre of mighty revolutions unknown in Europe: and it is a most undoubted fact, that Jengiz Khan, who subdued almost every country in the world to the eastward of the Euphrates, was dead many years before the accidental curiosity of Marco Paolo, who visited the court of his grandson Coblai Khan in the year 1260, made Europe acquainted either with him or his dominions.

FROM the researches and opinions of many Northern antiquaries, the Scandinavian Goths are discovered to have been early composed of two distinged bodies of people: the first Aborigines; the other Strangers; who are said to have possessed a degree of refinement, civilization, and science, far superior to the older inhabitants. Frequent allusions are made to their Asiatic origin. Their dress, their manners, their language, being in general distinguished by some epithet descriptive of superior elegance. It may possibly be objected, that Refinement and a Tartar are ideas extremely repugnant: yet every thing of this kind is merely comparative; and the more savage inhabitant of the North, who never till then knew a luxury of dress higher than the skin of an animal which he had killed, may easily be supposed to have admired whatever was, even in a small degree, superior to his own. But, in fact, the dress and equipage of the Tartar chiefs have ever been, in general, uncommonly splendid; and few circumstances seem to have been less attended to, by some of our greatest writers, than a proper distinction between the ruder and the more polished people who fill the immense extent of Tartary. Men totally dissimilar are grouped together, under one indiscriminate character, merely because they are known in Europe by one general name; whilst, among their numerous nations, a difference of character may prevail, not inferior perhaps to that which marks an Englishman from a Frenchman, a Hollander from a Portuguese.

NOTHING in nature can be more opposite than the civilized Arabian of Mecca to the ferocious plunderer of the desert; and the citizen of Samarcand has few features in common with the Tartar wanderer in the Northern wilds: yet even the great Montesquieu compares those people without distinction; and draws conclusions, which are by no means supported, from their manners, their government, or the geography of their countries. In some parts of Tartary there are large and flourishing cities, fertile plains, and noble rivers: in others, deserts, mountains, marshes, and forests; yet, amongst other positions, he says, "They have no towns; they have no forests, " and but few marshes: their rivers are almost " always frozen, and they dwell in an immense " plain." These are positive assertions; and they are all equally groundless as positive: but Montesquieu is here endeavouring to support a system; and system is dangerous even to the soundest reasoner. Can a region, containing above twenty millions of square miles, watered by such rivers as the Gihon, the Sihon, the Selenge, and the Aumur; boasting such cities as Samarcand, Bokhara, Cashgar, and Cara-corum; clustered with forests; broken into mountains; inhabited by many different nations; distinguished by every variety of soil, superficies, and climate, be called, with propriety, one immense plain; or correspond, in the most remote degree, with Montesquieu's description? The conclusions drawn too are as vague as the premises are unsubstantial. The wild Arabs are a race of roaming thieves; the wild Tartars, in this professional line, bear a pointed resemblance of character. Between these, to support an hypothesis, he wishes to find a political contrast. The Arabs are free; and he derives their freedom from their Rocks: the Tartars he chuses to make slaves, and he gives them an immense plain. Yet if there is a being on earth, who enjoys every species of irregular Liberty, it is the wandering Tartar. He is obedient to his chief in every circumstance of war: but there submission ends. *

EVERY observation, indeed, on the habits of those roving, daring people, strikingly displays their love of liberty, and their similitude of character with the old Gothic nations. Their aversion to the culture of the ground; their pastoral life; their idleness; their eagerness for plunder, and martial excursion; with many customs and beliefs, clearly Eastern: form all together a chain of internal proofs, stronger perhaps than direct historical assertion. By many Northern writers, they are actually distinguished from the more ancient inhabitants of Scandinavia, by the epithet of Oriental: and nothing can surely approach nearer in resemblance than the original northern invaders of the Roman states, and those inundations, immediately from Tartary, who, under the names of Alans and Huns, led by the famous Attila and other bold chiefs, overwhelmed the empire, towards the close of the fourth century, and gave a final blow to the chains of Roman servitude. †

SHOULD the foregoing observations, with others which will naturally arise in the further discussion of the subject, furnish arguments of sufficient force to support the above hypothesis, we shall easily account for one great channel, thro' which many circumstances, originally Eastern, penetrated to the Hyperborean regions: where, with such shades of variation, as might naturally be expected from a difference of climate and temperament, they sowed the seeds of that stile of manners, which finds nothing similar to it in the characteristics of Greece and Rome. ‡

THE Feudal System, which was introduced and diffused over Europe by the conquerors of the Roman power, produced, in a civil light, an alteration in laws, government, and habits, no less important than the dismemberment of the empire by their arms. Our greatest lawyers, historians, and antiquaries, whose object has been less to trace its origin than to mark its influence, have uniformly attributed this great foundation of the jurisprudence of modern Europe to the military policy of the Northern nations; and seem in general rather to have considered it as a consequence of their situation, after their conquests, than as existing previous to their irruptions. It appears not only to have formed, however, their great system of polity before the grand invasion, but to have flourished in the East with much vigour in very early times. §

IN Persia, Tartary, India, and other Eastern countries, the whole detail of government, from the most ancient accounts down to the present hour, can hardly be defined by any other description. We observe, in general, one Great King, to whom a number of subordinate princes pay homage and tribute; all deviation from this system seeming merely temporary and accidental. Possessed of every essential power of royalty, the degree of dependence of those secondary kings, we find, has ever been proportioned to the vigour or imbecillity of the paramount sovereign: for where no solid code of constitutional laws prevails, the brilliant or disgraceful periods in the history of a people will generally depend upon the genius of one man. A great monarch will give to the component parts the appearance of one despotic whole; whilst the approaches to disobedience will ever be proportioned to the weakness of administration. Constantly recurring, however, to first principles, every variation of Oriental Rule presents only, to our alternate view, an overgrown empire, feebly governed, crumbling into independent kingdoms; and independent kingdoms again uniting, to form the empire of some more fortunate and enterprising sovereign. ¶

A GENERAL view of the histories of Eastern nations would, perhaps, sufficiently support the above positions; but I shall venture to offer a few particular authorities. The more ancient facts, it may be observed, like every remote event, will not admit of positive proof; but in tracing manners or modes of government, absolute historical or chronological precision is by no means requisite. The actions of one prince may be imputed to another; anachronisms and misnomers may abound; and the achievements of twenty warriors may swell the renown of one hero: but no writer will attribute to his nation Customs and Ideas of Government, to which they or their ancestors were strangers; and against which the opinions of his fellow subjects must instantly and loudly revolt. When uncommon and great innovations happen, in the customs of a country, writers are careful to trace their origin, to fix their introduction, and to observe their influence. But when circumstances, however interesting, are simply mentioned, without particular observation or commentary, we may rationally conclude, that such customs are of high antiquity; and no more deserving of special animadversion than the general complexion, configuration, or temperament of their countrymen. The rise and progress of the

Feudal System in Europe is marked : it was an exotic plant ; and it has, of consequence, engaged the attention of our ablest antiquaries. But in the East it is indigenous, universal, and immortal : and the Eastern historians have never dreamt of investigating its source, any more than the origin of regal government. Both have long been to them equally familiar ; and the first extensive monarchy gave probably a beginning to the first dependence of feudal chiefs. It may be thought too, that examples of this, or any other custom, brought from events, subsequent to their introduction into Europe, can be no corroborative proof of their subsisting in the East, previous to their appearance in the West. But the least attention to Oriental Manners will clearly show, that the characteristic habits of those people, even at this hour, are, in every respect, similar to the most remote accounts : nor have we ground to believe, that, (the Mohammedan religion and fire arms excepted), there is one single custom, peculiar to the Persians, the Arabians, or the Tartars, of the present day, which did not prevail amongst their ancestors at a period too remote for human research. With a wonderful predilection for their own ancient manners, they have a peculiar and invincible antipathy to those of Europe. They are so opposite to their genius, to their hereditary prejudices, and to every idea political and religious, that no instance can be produced, perhaps, of one single custom originally European having ever been adopted by any Asiatic nation : the Turks even, whose vicinity exposes them most to Western innovation, preserving still unchanged that remarkable distinction of character which they possessed before they crossed the Bosphorus of Thrace. On this ground, therefore, I give no anecdotes as unquestioned truths : they are mentioned by Asiatic historians ; and I offer them simply as beliefs in original customs. We may not subscribe to the apparition of Cæsar's ghost before the battle of Philippi ; but we may rest assured, that it had not been recorded by Plutarch, unless consonant to the opinion of the people. *

ABOUT 800 years before the Christian era, an usurper called Zohak, we are informed, reigned in Persia. His government was oppressive, and became at length insupportable. The citizens of Ispahan flew to arms, and, headed by a Blacksmith named Gao, attacked, defeated, and killed the Tyrant. Gao, after this victory, discovering the retreat of Feridoun, the heir to the crown, placed him on the throne ; and received, in return, Ispahan, with its dependencies, as a feudal principality. What truth may be in this remote event it is impossible to determine ; but it is a generally recorded fact, that the Blacksmith's apron, said to have been displayed by Gao, when marching against Zohak, as a banner, from the point of a spear, was taken by the Arabians at the battle of Cadeffia, when they conquered Persia in the year 636. It had been laid up in the treasury of the Persian kings, and was enriched with jewels to a prodigious value. It was considered as the great standard and palladium of the empire ; and was never carried to the field but on important emergencies, or when the king marched in person.—Rostam is a hero whose prowess is highly celebrated. He is equally the favourite of History and Romance. He was a successful general under the first kings of the Kaianian dynasty ; and received, in reward for his services, the provinces of Sejestan and Zablestan, as feudal appannages on the crown of Persia ; on the condition of marching a body of forces, as the exigencies of the state might require ; but particularly to repulse the inroads of the Tartars.—Babylonia, Syria, Assyria, and Media, as formerly observed, seem to have been merely feudatory kingdoms of the old Persian empire.—Alexander the Great divided the Eastern provinces of Persia amongst the princes to whose families they had originally belonged. On this occasion they received a banner from the hands of the conqueror, paid homage, and engaged to maintain a certain number of troops, upon a footing (says the author of the Tarikh Montekheb) somewhat resembling the military vassals of the Ottoman empire, called Sanjacs and Timars. These princes are called by the Mohammedan writers Molouku'l'Tawayif (kings of the nations) ; and are by some considered as a particular dynasty, between the Kaianians and the Afhcanians, commonly called Arfacides by Europeans. They strictly performed, it is added, their feudal engagements to Alexander ; but on his death, as the Grecian commanders seized upon the Western kingdoms, they also assumed an independency in their respective provinces. This account seems highly probable ; as the successors of Alexander, according both to the Eastern and Western writers, soon lost all sovereignty to the eastward of the Tigris. *

THE Tobba, or king of Arabia Felix, was the acknowledged paramount sovereign in very old times of a number of tribes.—Most of the provinces of Arabia on the Persian gulph, with those stretching towards Babylonia, held of the Persian kings of the Sassanian dynasty ; who often appointed feudatory princes on the death or misconduct of their predecessors.—The Khalif Almamon gave Khorasan, which he himself held as a feudal sovereignty under his father Haron Arrashid, to his great general Thaher ; where he soon after became independent, and founded the dynasty of Thaherians. Similar grants were made or extorted from succeeding Khalifs ; so that partly by gift, partly by usurpation, the Khalifat, from the middle of the ninth century, till its dissolution in the year 1258, was in fact one immense feudatory empire; where every Sultan acknowledged the superiority of the Khalif; but, like the great feudal chiefs in Europe, paid him just that degree of obedience which each judged consistent with his own interest.—A similar system prevails to the present hour in Hindostan; thro' a regular gradation of Subahs, Nabobs, Foujdars, Killadars, and other subordinate chiefs; who all consider the Great Mogul as lord paramount of the empire.—In the Ottoman government there are many remarkable traces of the feudal system; especially in the Khan of the Crim Tartars, in the Wayvodes of Moldavia, Wallakhia, and other European districts; in Algiers and other Barbary States; in the Sherif of Mecca; in several Sheiks or princes of Syria; as well as in the military fiefs, which, under the titles of Sanjacs, Zayms, and Timariots, are bestowed with the express condition of supporting bodies of men, but especially of horse, ready to take the field at the order of the Sultan.

IN Tartary we see it strong. Temujin, afterwards distinguished by the more celebrated name of Jengiz Khan, was the son of a chief, who had several feudatories; yet he himself held of Thogrul, the Khan of Cara-cum, better known by the name of Prester John. Thogrul, tho' a prince of great power, was still subject to the emperor of Katha, the paramount of Tartary; who accordingly, in the true feudal stile, summoned him with his arriere vassals to assist in quelling a dangerous rebellion. Thogrul, attended by young Temujin, obeyed; a decisive victory was gained over the insurgents; in which both behaved with so much gallantry, that the emperor created Thogrul Vang Khan, which is a high royal title; and gave Temujin a considerable command in his army. When Temujin, by his success and abilities, had risen to a great degree of power, about the year 1205 a grand council of the Tartar nations assembled. Nine of the chief Khans appeared at the rendezvous, each attended by his vassals. They displayed nine large banners of command. They placed Jengiz upon an eminence, with a piece of black felt-cloth under his feet. The speaker of the assembly addressed him: he recognized him as emperor in the name of the whole; and told him, if merciful and just, that God would prosper his government; if not, his person and memory would become black and despicable as the felt on which he stood. A prophet called Cokza, and surnamed the Image of God, declared, that he had received a revelation from heaven, ordering Temujin to take from that time, the name of Jengiz, which signifies The most Great. The Khans then advanced and paid him homage, bending the knee nine times; the nobles followed; and then the body of the people, making the same number of genuflections, proclaimed him emperor with loud acclamations. We find some variation of ceremony in the inauguration of Tamerlane in the year 1369. He mounted a magnificent throne: he wore a brilliant crown: he girded himself publicly with his sword: his feudatory princes acknowledged his sovereignty by a profusion of precious stones which they showered over his head; whilst a holy man put into his hands a drum, and a standard, as the insignia of imperial authority.

EVERY thing in the histories of those princes is indeed compleatly feudal. Before their great expeditions, we find them issuing orders for the attendance of their great vassals, with their contingents of troops. And we also observe a constitutional Parliament, or Meeting of Estates; who, amongst other privileges, claimed that of trying great offenders. Artok Buga, one of the grandsons of Jengiz Khan, having revolted against his brother the emperor Coblai Khan, was at length defeated; but Coblai did not punish him, till he had called an Assembly of the States; where he was tried and condemned to be shut up between four walls, made of the tragacanth tree, where he lived twelve months. A feudatory prince of Herat, called Pir Ali, being suspected of a design to revolt soon after Tamerlane's inauguration, was cited to appear before the General Assembly: he evaded the summons till he had fortified his capital: upon which a decree was passed similar to the Ban of the Empire in Germany; and Tamerlane being desired to reduce him to obedience, he was accordingly put to death in consequence of this sentence. It is needless to multiply examples: but it may not be improper to observe, that those General Meetings, called Kouriltai, bear so near a resemblance to the Diets of the Gothic nations, that a strong additional argument may thence be drawn to support the hypothesis of the early Tartar establishments in Germany and Scandinavia. Jengiz and Tamerlane, powerful and despotic as they were, held many of those Diets. The Great Khans, tho generally chosen from the sons of the late sovereign, were elected by them; and primogeniture was of little consequence. Jengiz Khan, for example, nominated his second surviving son Oçtay, as his successor: but though uncommon deference was paid to the will of a man whom the Tartars almost adored, the new emperor was not acknowledged as such, till the meeting of the Great Assembly two years afterwards; where, upon his expressing some reluctance to accept of the imperial dignity, his elder and younger brothers, Jagathay and Tuli, taking him by the hands, installed him on the throne, and saluted him Khan. Olug Nuvin, the youngest of Jengiz Khan's sons, as master of the household, presented him with a cup of wine; and all the people, making nine genuflections to their sovereign, and three to the son, hailed him Emperor. *

It may not be unworthy of remark, that the situation of Olug Nuvin is a curious instance of a singular custom long prevalent in Tartary, as well as among the Northern nations; and even to be found in our old Saxon tenures, under the description of Borough English: where the youngest son succeeds to his father in preference to his elder brothers. Sir William Blackstone, after mentioning the opinions of Littleton and other eminent lawyers, in regard to the origin of this strange custom, conjectures, with great judgment, that it might be deduced from the Tartars. Amongst those people, the elder sons, as they grew to man's estate, migrated from their father with a certain portion of cattle; and the youngest son only remaining at home, became in consequence the heir to his father's house, and all his remaining possessions. Jengiz Khan had, agreeably to this idea, given to his four eldest sons great governments and great offices; but Olug always attended his person. During the interval of forty days, therefore, from the meeting of the Great Tartar Assembly, till the installation of Octay Khan, this youngest brother seems to have been acknowledged by him and the other princes as Lord of the family: he was a kind of public administrator during this interregnum; and presented the Great Khan with the cup, on his enthronement, as the highest token of Eastern hospitality, which the master of a family can show to a guest. *

In the above outlines, we can observe several strong traces of Gothic government. We can perceive the ruder draughts of States General, of Parliaments, of Juries; and, in the circumstances of the Electors and Elected, some striking features of that system, which still unites the great Germanic Body. We can see, in the bent of national genius, the strongest marks of wild freedom; with a regular gradation of military vassals: and although, in their own country, from a general attachment to pastoral life, Fiefs, or possessions in land, formed no part of Tartar jurisprudence or property; yet when they settled in the West, a difference of situation would naturally suggest an alteration adapted to it. The more steady temper of the native Scandinavians and Germans would modify the roaming Scythian spirit; a superior attachment to a particular spot would naturally arise: as the country became more populous, ground would become more valuable; and what was formerly in common, to avoid disputes, would then be portioned off. A wish to defend this property from new inroads might soon produce a more permanent and solid system of subordination: and the more irregular feudal ideas of the Tartars, improved by territorial possession, pave thus, by degrees, the way for that more refined system, so peculiarly adapted to the situation of settling invaders; which, in the fifth and following centuries, almost universally took place in Europe. *

NEXT to the Feudal System, and other maxims of civil government, which regulated the property and politics of the middle ages, few speculative subjects are more worthy of our attention than those novel ideas of Supernatural Beings, which ruled their minds with most resistless force. The universal belief in various orders of superhuman creatures, has prevailed in many parts of Asia long before the era of authentic history: and such compleat possession have they taken of Eastern imagination, that the most serious, as well as the most fanciful compositions, are filled with perpetual allusions to those imaginary beings. To understand Homer, we must have a previous knowledge of the dignities and attributes of the Grecian Deities: to comprehend the writers of the East, we should have an acquaintance with the mythology and popular beliefs of Eastern nations. For this purpose, I have thrown into the Dictionary slight sketches of what seemed most peculiarly Asiatic; and shall here bring those remarks under one point of view; with such additional observations as could not, with propriety, find any alphabetical place, or which may appear necessary to illustrate and connect the whole. *

THE fabulous Asiatic ages stretch far beyond the creation of man. They suppose the world to have been repeatedly peopled by creatures of different formation, who were successively annihilated or banished for disobedience to the Supreme Being. An Eastern Romance introduces the hero Caherman in conversation with the monstrous bird or Griffon Simurgh; who tells him, that she had already lived to see the earth seven times filled with creatures, and seven times a perfect void: that the age of Adam would be seven thousand years; when the race of man would be extinguished, and their place supplied by beings of another form and more perfect nature; with whom the earth would end: that she had then seen twelve great periods of seven thousand years; but was denied the knowledge of the duration of her own existence. Those beings, who inhabited the globe immediately before the creation of man, they call Peris and Dives; and they form a perfect contrast. The Peris are described as beautiful and benevolent; and though guilty of errors which had offended Omnipotence, they are supposed, in consequence of their penitence, still to enjoy distinguished marks of divine favour. The Dives, on the contrary, are pictured as hideous in form, and malignant in mind; differing only from the infernal demons in not being confined to hell; but roaming for ever around the world to scatter discord and wretchedness among the sons of Adam. In the Peris we find a wonderful resemblance to the Faeries of the European nations: and the Dives or Genies differ little from the Giants and Savages of the middle ages: the adventures of the Eastern heroes breathe all the wildness of achievement recorded of the knights in Gothic romance; and the doctrine of enchantments, in both, seems to claim one common source. The various creatures who preceded Adam, were supposed to have been governed by a succession of seventy-two Solimans; the last of whom is surnamed Jan ben Jan. This monarch had offended Omnipotence; and the angel Hares was sent from heaven to chastise him. A war ensued, which terminated in the defeat of the pre-adamite king; and Hares governed in his room. But this angel becoming also intoxicated with power, Adam was created; and all the earth ordered to obey him. Hares, composed of the element of fire, scorned submission to a clay-formed creature. He rebelled against the Divine will; and was joined in his revolt by the Dives: but the Peris, acquiescing in the mandates of heaven, became from that time the friends of mankind. Hares, with his chief followers, were cursed by God, and doomed to a long period of torment in the infernal regions: but the other Dives were allowed to range over the earth, as a security for the future obedience of man. The residence of those ideal beings was imagined to be on the mountain of Kaf; which in the East was long supposed to surround the earth, as a ring does the finger: the globe being fancied to rest on one great emerald or sapphire; the reflection from which gave the azure appearance to the sky; whilst its movements were productive of volcanoes, earthquakes, and all the convulsive phenomena of nature. The whole of this visionary country is called Ginnistan; and the respective empires are divided into many kingdoms and cities. Those of the Peris bear the names of Sbadukam (pleasure and desire), Gouberabad (the city of jewels), Amberabad (the city of Ambergris): and the metropolis of the Dives is called Abermanabad (the city of the Principle of Evil); where the enchanted castle, palace, and gallery of the Dive king Arzhenk is the subject of much fable. The Peris and Dives are supposed to be formed of the element of fire: they live long, but are subject to death; and though possessed of superhuman powers, have in many respects the sentiments and passions of mankind. They wage incessant war; and when the Dives make prisoners of the Peris, they shut them up in iron cages, and hang them on the highest trees; to expose them to public view, and to every chilling blast. Here they are visited by their companions, who bring them the choicest odours. Perfume is the only food of the Peris; and whilst it serves as nourishment to the captives, it has also the virtue of keeping at a distance the insulting Dives; whose malignancy of nature can endure nothing fragrant. *

WHEN the Peris are in danger of being overpowered by their foes, they always solicit the assistance of some mortal hero; which furnishes a wonderful fund of fanciful machinery for Eastern Poetry and Romance. To put the Knight on a footing of prowess with those gigantic Dives, he is in general armed with enchanted talismans; and mounted on some tremendous monster. One of the most famous adventurers in Faery-land is Tahmuras, an ancient Persian king. The Peris honour him with a splendid embassy; and the Dives, who dread him, send also another. He consults the Griffon Simurgh: she speaks all languages, and knows future events. She counsels him to aid the Peris; informs him of the dangers he will encounter; and gives him instructions how to proceed. She offers her assistance to conduct him to Ginnistan; and, as a token of friendship, pulls some feathers from her breast, with which he ornaments his helmet. He then mounts the Simurgh; and, armed with the buckler of Jan ben Jan, crosses the dark abyss, which mortals cannot pass without supernatural assistance. He arrives at Kaf: he defeats Arzhenk; and also another Dive, still more fierce, called Demrush; whose residence is described as a gloomy cavern, where he is surrounded with vast piles of wealth, amassed by plunder. Here Tahmuras, amongst other rich spoils, finds a fair captive, the Peri Merjan; whom the Dive had carried off, and her brothers had long searched for in vain. He chains the vanquished demons in the centre of the mountain; sets Merjan at liberty; and then, in the true spirit of Knight-errantry, flies, at the Peri's request, to the attack of another powerful Dive, called Houdkonz; but here Tahmuras falls.—In the Shah namé, the celebrated Rostam, many ages afterwards, engages the Dive Arzhenk, who had escaped from the chains of Tahmuras; and kills him, after a fierce battle. Arzhenk is there painted with a body somewhat human, and the head of a bull, which Rostam strikes off at a blow.—The Dive Munheras is wounded with an arrow in mouth by Gerhab, the last king of the Pishadian dynasty; and he is afterwards put to death by Sohrab the son of Rostam. In the first encounter he has the head of a hog; but in the next he is pictured as a bifrons; one resembling the head of a lion, the other that of a wild boar. Rostam, who is considered as the Hercules of Persia, among many other Dives, dragons, and enchanters, whom he destroys, kills a demon called the Dive Sepid: and Father Angelo mentions having seen a stupendous monument in the midst of a plain, near the city of Fehelion, between Shuster and Shiraz, cut into a quadrangular fortification, with such regularity, that it has the appearance of being formed of one entire stone. *

THIS Dissertation would swell, however, to a disproportioned bulk, were I to enter into a detail of the various wonderful adventures with which the Eastern Poems and Romances abound. I give these few outlines, merely to show the general prevalence of Romantic Ideas in Asia: but especially in Persia, the great classic ground of Eastern Fiction; and the centre whence it seems to have spread to almost every surrounding and distant country. So singular indeed is the resemblance, in numberless instances, between the wild imagery of this stile of fabling, with that which prevailed in after-times in Europe, that we must either suppose, in the writers, a wonderful coincidence of luxuriant imagination, or conclude, that the West must have borrowed from the East. I shall not insist upon Turpin's Twelve Peers, upon the Armorican, Spanish, and other European Romances; where the similarity of features is irregularly striking: but even in the nobler works of Ariosto, Tasso, and Spencer, we can discover the counter part of all their fanciful machinery in the fictions of Persia. The Ipogriffo, on which Astolfo flies to heaven; and the magic ring of Bradamante in Orlando Furioso: the many-beaded monster of Dueffa; and the shield of Prince Arthur in the Faery Queen: with the various enchantments of Armida and Ismeno in Gierusalemme Liberata; may all be traced to Oriental origin: whilst the Peri Merjan has much the air of being the Faery Morgain, who conveyed away our King Arthur, after the battle of Camelon; and with whom, according to the old British Romances, he now resides in Faery land with great happiness and splendor. *

SOME ingenious writers have considered this species of fiction as originating among the Arabians: but there are many reasons for believing, that it was absolutely unknown to them before the era of the Hejra; and that they did not adopt that mode of writing till long after the Persian conquest. Mohammed, as before observed, was uncommonly alarmed at the first romantic glimmerings, which were brought from Persia by the merchant Nasser. He was afraid lest the minds of his countrymen should be more strongly impressed with those wildly pleasing tales, than with the doctrines of the Alcoran: and he accordingly reprobates those foreign figments, as abhorred by God and the Prophet. The warriors, who figure in Faery-land, are all ancient Persian kings and heroes. The Arabians have not even a word in their language expressive of the greatest beauty of Eastern romance, the Peri: and altho' Jin is now used synonymously with Dive; yet its proper and original meaning was merely an Infernal Fiend; a Being very distinct from the Romantic inhabitant of Kaf. The same observation will hold, with regard to the most uncommon monsters; who seem all to be natives of Persian fancy: the words used by the Arabians, to express the Persian Simûrgb, Ouranabad, or Rakshé; as well their dragons and other machinery of Romance, having in general simple radical significations, expressive of creatures, which really exist; and seem only to have been figuratively applied, to those imaginary monsters, in later times. A large serpent, for example, is transformed into a dragon: an eagle, or a long-neck'd animal, represents the Simurgh: a dangerous or inhuman villain is turned into a Giant, a Demon, or any terrifying appearance: and a word, expressive of a Dreadful Calamity, or Sudden Horror, which deprives people of their senses, is metaphorically converted into a species of monster, supposed to haunt woods, church-yards, and other lonely places; and not only to tear the living to pieces, but to dig up and devour the bodies of the dead. As the language then of every people will always be observed to abound in radical words, expressive of every kind of imagery which has been long familiar to them; we must conclude, upon the best grounds, where such words are not to be found; and metaphorical, or exotic expressions, appear to be the only substitutes; that the ideas, described by those words, are not indigenous, but adopted from foreign nations; and as the Arabians have no terms, in their tongue, radically expressive of any thing superhuman, excepting Angels and Devils; Romance, whose characteristic genius rolls entirely on a peculiar and distinct species of machinery, could not apparently have originated in Arabia. *

EXCLUSIVE of the universal belief in the fanciful Peri System, which may be called the Mythology of Romance, the ancient Persians appear in general to have acknowledged one Supreme Being; and to have paid a high degree of veneration to Angels, as subordinate deities. This, with a respect for the stars, was the great doctrine of the Sabian religion, which prevailed of old in Persia, Arabia, and other Eastern countries. As these Angels are not only frequently alluded to in Eastern authors, but throw considerable light on the detail of private life, a few observations upon them may not be useless. *

WHEN Ormuzd, or Omnipotence, created mankind, the Persians suppose that he gave, at the same time, the superintendency of the world, and of every thing animate or inanimate, to certain guardian Angels. Though man was the peculiar charge of the Supreme Being, yet all his actions, and every accident to which he was liable, were still imagined to be, in a great measure, dependent on the influence of the presiding Angel. Every circumstance of public or family concern had, in consequence, their favourite times: established ceremonies were observed with anxious attention; and various public festivals were appointed, to conciliate the benevolence of those ministers of heaven: *

To procure the favour, or command the service, of Beings, who were supposed to be the cause of the felicity or misery of man, was a natural wish; and some there were who pretended to possess this power. Hence the origin of charms, of talismans, and of all the armour of offensive and defensive of enchantment. In the rudest times, there will be ever found men, who are better versed in the arcana of nature than the uninformed multitude. A love of ease, and an aversion to pain, are the great laws of nature, and the mind is perpetually fluctuating between a wish for the one, and a dread of the other. To pretend boldly therefore to a power of bestowing happiness, or removing misery, hardly ever failed, in the days of ignorance, to gain a man believers: and he seldom found difficulty in interesting the passions of the people, provided he could by any means impose upon their senses. An attention to the principles of mechanism, to the operations of chymistry, to the virtues of plants, and the various laws of nature, might produce discoveries incomprehensible by simple men: and a few remarkable instances of the efficacy of mere natural causes, would easily gain the possessors of those secrets the reputation of inflicting torment or commanding pleasure at a wish. To enjoy the reputation and advantages of those fancied supernatural powers, was not enough. Some pretended to have the art of communicating them to others: necromancy became of course a regular study; and the people at large, who could not aim at such occult sciences, were happy to supply their want of knowledge by the purchase of talismans, amulets, or charms, in whose virtues they placed a perfect and most wonderful confidence. ^b

TALISMANS and Amulets have long engaged the attention of Eastern nations; and accurate rules have been laid down for their construction. The gem, the chrystal, the metal, or other substance, is ordered to be dug, or searched for, when some particular angel rules the day. It must be prepared or engraved under the influence of another; and the zemzemé, or prayer of a third must be pronounced over it, to give it that mysterious virtue for which it is esteemed. Different ceremonies are necessary in gathering the herbs, and flowers; in cropping the hairs of camels, sea-cows, or other animals of which the amulets are formed: and the suspending them round the necks of men, women, children, or animals, is performed with much precision and solemnity. Yet real knowledge might originally have given rise to what the views of the artful, and the superstition of the ignorant, afterwards perverted to the purposes of folly. An intelligent observer might discover, that certain plants had their juices in high perfection at particular seasons; that some should be gathered at sunrise, when moist with dew; others at the meridian, when under the influence of mid-day heat. He might imagine, that the external application of medicinal herbs, of mineral substances, of tufts of hair or wool, whilst impregnated with the effluvia or perspiration of the animal, might have a salutary effect in various ailments; and experience would confirm the justness of his conjecture. But the million, ever unable or unwilling to investigate natural causes (especially when impressed with a conviction, that every distemper, and every misfortune, proceeded from the operations of malevolent spirits, or the fascination of malignant eyes), would impute the cures which such applications performed, not to the essential qualities of their compounds, but to supernatural agency, and unessential ceremony. They applied them, in consequence, without distinction, not only to the old and to the young, to the sick and to the healthy, to the brute creation as well as rational beings; but placed even things inanimate under their protection. An ass's head, cabalistically prepared, and erected on a pole in a garden or field, was supposed to be an effectual defence against fascination, and a consequent scarcity of produce: whilst a talisman, buried along with hidden treasure, was imagined to put it in perfect safety, by rendering it invisible to every eye but those of the owner. Nothing is indeed more common in the East than the burying of treasure: and it took its rise from that unsteady system of government, which has in general prevailed in those countries. Ever apprehensive of revolution and ruin, a rich man generally divides his estate into three parts: one he employs in trade, or the necessary purposes of life; another he invests in jewels, which he may easily carry off, if forced to fly; and the third he buries. As he intrusts nobody with the secret of this deposit, which he guards with his talisman, if he dies before he returns to the spot, it is then lost to the world; till accident throws it in the way, perhaps, of some fortunate peasant, when turning up his ground. Those discoveries of hidden treasure, and sudden transitions from poverty to riches, of which we read in Oriental tales, are by no means therefore quite ideal; but a natural consequence of the manners of the people. *

To understand the machinery of Angels, it will be proper to make some previous observations on the ancient Persian era, with which they are intimately connected. This was supposed to have been established by king Gemshid, one of the Pishdadian princes; the date of whose reign seems too uncertain even for conjecture: though some judicious writers place him about 800 years before Christ. On the day when the Sun entered Aries, he is said to have made his first public entry into Istakhar or Persepolis, which he had just finished; and to have ordered the era to commence from that time, in honour of the Sun, and to commemorate the building of his capital city. He divided the year into twelve months, of thirty days each; to the last of which they afterwards added five supplementary days, to make up the whole 365. No attention was, for some time, paid to any intercalation similar to our Leap Year; till astronomers, observing, at length, that the Sun, at the beginning of the year; had made a retrograde motion from Aries to Pisces, inserted one month at the end of every 120 years; which they celebrated with one continued festival. Yezdejird, the last king of the Sassanian dynasty, reformed the Kalendar: and his era is adopted at this hour in many parts of Persia; particularly by the Parfis of Kirman, and by those of Guzerat in Hindostan. But all do not agree in the epoch of commencement; some dating it from the beginning of Yezdejird's reign, A. D. 632; some from his defeat at Cadeffia in 636; and others from his death in 651. On the conquest of Persia by the Mohammedans the lunar computation was introduced; and it is still attended to in matters of religion: but about the year 1079, the Persian Kalendar was again reformed by great Sultan Malekshah Jelaleddin; and continues now to be adhered to in several parts of Persia. This prince, whilst he removed the Sun from Pisces to Aries, made also an alteration in the position of the months; under the idea of restoring the ancient mode fixed by Gemshid. From those changes, however, there has arisen a disagreement amongst the different writers, with regard to the seasons and days, when several festivals were celebrated; which, were it of consequence, it would be difficult to reconcile: it being probable that, in later times, different provinces solemnized them upon the days which corresponded with the respective eras they had adopted; and that some ceremonies were perhaps introduced by the Mohammedan princes, which were unknown in ancient Persia.

EVERY month was supposed to be under the guardianship of an angel, from whom it received its name. The subdivision by weeks was not known till later times; but every day had also a ruling angel of a subordinate degree: the superior angels having each a day, in their respective months, which was observed with more than ordinary attention. Their festivals were, in consequence, numerous; and many of them uncommonly splendid. I shall slightly touch upon such as seem most worthy of notice. The chief were those about the Equinoxes; the next were those of Water at Midsummer, and of Fire at the Winter Solstice. The first was the Nauruz, which commenced with their year in March, and lasted six days; during which all ranks seem to have participated in one general joy. The rich sent presents to the poor: all were dressed in their holiday clothes; all kept open house; and religious processions, music, dancing, a species of theatrical exhibition, rustic sports, and other pastimes, presented a continued round of varied amusement. Even the dead, and the ideal things, were not forgotten; rich viands being placed on the tops of houses and high towers, on the flavour of which the Peris and Spirits of their departed heroes and friends were supposed to feast. The Parfis of Guzerat still celebrate the last ten days of the year as a festival to departed spirits. The first five days they suppose the souls of the blessed to hover three bow-shots above the earth; and during the five last they imagine, that not only they, but the damned also, visit their surviving friends: on which account, to give them the best reception, their houses are purified and decked out to the greatest advantage. During these ten days they never go from home.—The festival of Mibrgan lasted also six days: it began about the middle of September; and was celebrated with some unessential difference of ceremony; both being in honour of their great ostensible deity, the Sun.—In June they solemnized the Abrizgan, in honour of the element of Water: to which, as well as Fire, they paid a high degree of respect. It lasted only one day; during which all degrees of people sprinkled one another with pure water, or with distillations from roses, orange flowers, and other odoriferous herbs.—In December, on the shortest night of the year, was the anniversary of the great Festival of Fire, called Sheb seze; when their temples were illuminated, and large piles of fire blazed all over the kingdom; round which the people entertained themselves all night with choral dances, and various amusements peculiar to the season. Amongst other ceremonies common on this occasion, there was one, which, whether it originated in superstition or caprice, seems to have been singularly cruel and pernicious. The kings and the great men, used to set fire to large bunches of dry combustibles, fastened round wild beasts and birds; which being then let loose, the air and earth appeared one great illumination: and as those terrified creatures naturally fled to the woods for shelter, it is easy to conceive that conflagrations, which would often happen, must have been peculiarly destructive, where a people considered the extinguishing of fire, by water, as one of the highest acts of impiety.

THERE were many other festivals; some of which seem whimsical, though others had apparently an excellent political tendency. One of the most ludicrous appears to have been that which they celebrated about the Vernal Equinox, called Koufa nishin. This was an old beardless one-eyed figure, representing Winter on his departure, mounted on an ass or a mule, with a crow in one hand, and a scourge and fan in the other. In this manner he paraded the streets, followed by all ranks of people, from the royal family to the beggar. Amongst many frolics, which the populace played with the old man, they sprinkled him alternately with hot and cold water; whilst he, crying out gurma, gurma, (heat! heat!) sometimes fanned himself, and sometimes lashed his tormentors. He had the privilege of going into every shop, and into every house; where the least delay in presenting him with a piece of money, gave him a right to seize the effects of every trader; and to bespatter the clothes, even of the greatest nobles, with a mixture of ink, red earth, and water, which he carried in a pot by his side. But all were prepared for Koufa at their doors; and their offerings were made the moment of his approach. What he thus received, from the beginning of the cavalcade to the first hour of prayer, was paid to the king, or to the governors of those cities, where the sovereign did not reside: a circumstance which seems evidently to point to a superstitious origin; for, upon any other ground, the whole of the poor creature's collections could be no object to men of their elevated rank. From the first to the second hour of prayer, the amount of the receipts was the property of the old man; and here his pageant ended. He then suddenly disappeared: for after this time, the first person he met in the streets might severely beat him with impunity.—The next festival, solemnized in April, called Khurm ruz, is in a different stile; and appears to have been founded upon the rational principles of good government; as it tended to give dignity to a most useful and respectable body of men. The king dined in public; and the chiefs of the farmers had the honour of sitting at table with him: when their sovereign addressed them in words to the following effect. “I am one of you; my subsistence, “and that of my people, rests on the labour of “your hands: the succession of the race of man “depends upon the plough; and without you “we cannot exist. But your dependence upon “me is reciprocal: we ought therefore to be “brothers, and to live in perpetual harmony.”—In the month of December they held a festival in honour of deceased friends, images of whom they formed in paste; which they placed where many streets or roads met. They made offerings to them; treated them with great respect; and then burnt them with much solemnity.—In the same month was the ceremony of driving the

Dives from their houses. For this purpose the Magi wrote certain words with saffron on parchment or paper; and then smoked it over a fire, into which they put the horn of an animal killed on the 16th of September, cotton, garlick, grapes, and wild rue. The spell, thus prepared, was glued or nailed to the inside of the door, which was painted red. The priest then took sand, which he spread with a knife, whilst he muttered over it certain prayers; and then strowing it on the floor, the enchantment was complete: and the Dives were supposed immediately to vanish; or at least to be deprived of all malignant influence.—The fifth of February was considered as the proper day for clearing their dwellings of scorpions; a much more serious evil than the Dives. With this view, they pasted on three of the walls of the house, small slips of paper, called Nushtei Guzshdum, inscribed with magic characters; none being stuck upon that in which was the gate-way. After various ceremonies, the door was opened, when those noxious animals generally disappeared; which they attributed entirely to the virtue of the spells: whilst the sprinkling of their habitations with compounds, offensive to those creatures, and other preparatory steps, were only considered as secondary causes.—But the most romantic of all their festivals seems to have been the Merd giran, celebrated in February, in honour of the presiding angel Isfendarmuz. He was considered as the Guardian of the Fair Sex, who, on this occasion, enjoyed very singular privileges. They were vested with almost absolute power. The husbands complied, to the utmost of their ability, with all the commands of their wives; and the virgins, without offence to delicacy, might pay their addresses to whom they pleased; and they seldom sued in vain. Numberless marriages were in consequence solemnized, and many engagements made; the angel being supposed to shew remarkable favour, not only to the nuptials then celebrated, but to all the contracts entered into during his gay festival. An institution, which seems to bear some resemblance to the ancient gallantry of Valentine's day in Europe.

A N attention to those observances, as well as to fortunate days, fortunate names, and every circumstance of supernatural influence, we find, indeed, was by no means confined, in the East, to the lower orders of men: the greatest, and the most learned, appearing to have been impressed with a belief, equally strong with that of the meanest and the most ignorant. An Asiatic setting out on important business, would return if he met a person whom he supposed to have a shum kedem (a black or unlucky foot); or if he saw a deer descending a mountain, or appearing at his back. When a married man took a long journey, it was common for him to twist, in a particular manner, two branches of the broom called retem: if on his return he found them as he left them, he was perfectly satisfied of the fidelity of his wife; but if any accident had unloosed or discomposed them, nothing could induce him to believe her innocent. — As in those countries the crops were often destroyed for want of rain, amongst other ceremonies, which they supposed had virtue to procure it, they tied some combustibles to the tail of a bullock, especially of the wild breed; to which they set fire: and if he then ran up the hill, they looked upon it as a certain prognostic of rain. — When a Persian peasant thought his corn was too long in winnowing, he took a kind of bastard saffron, called bad engiz, which he rubbed; and throwing it in the air, the wind was expected immediately to spring up. *

ASTROLOGY, divination, and the interpretation of dreams, were fashionable studies with men of rank; and they in general carried with them, wherever they went, pocket astronomical tables, which they consulted, as well as astrologers, on every affair of moment. — Amru, one of the greatest and most penetrating of the Arabian generals, after having subdued part of Egypt, and other countries, sat down before Jerusalem; and had almost reduced it to a surrender, when he was told by an astrologer, that the predicted conqueror of the Holy City had only three letters in his name. Struck with this, Amru suspended his operations, and sent a messenger immediately to his master, the Khalif Omar, whose name in Arabic consists of only three letters: and upon his arrival in the camp, the town instantly capitulated. — Tamerlane seldom marched till the astrologers fixed the lucky hour: and an idiot having once thrown a breast of mutton at him, precisely at the time he was meditating the conquest of Kharezme, sometimes called the Breast of the World, he interpreted it, before all his army, as an infallible omen of his success. Much good policy, as well as superstition, may possibly, indeed, have been at the bottom of Tamerlane's conduct; as it must have highly animated his troops, who were constitutionally impressed with the most powerful ideas of omens, spells, and every species of supernatural belief: a most cruel proof of which their ancestors had given, when they over-ran the Khalifat in the thirteenth century: for many of the Mohammedans having a custom of carrying about them verses or chapters of the Alcoran, by way of preservatives or charms; the Tartars considered all they met, with such papers, as enchanters; and put them to death without mercy. The Tartars have ever, indeed, been so strongly impressed with the idea of enchantments, that we meet with strange details in some of their most authentic writers. Abulgazi, King of Kharezme, who writes a genealogical history of the Tartars, very gravely tells us, that Tuli, one of the sons of Jengiz Khan, having been surrounded by the Kathay or Chinese army, would have been cut to pieces, had he not ordered one of his magicians to turn Summer into Winter. The conjuror accordingly began his operations, and continued them for three days, when he brought down such a storm of hail and snow, that the Khan of Kathay's army, clothed in silken garments and thin stuffs, being unable to move, were slaughtered without resistance. *

CHIVALRY, or Knight-errantry, has ever been so intimately connected with enchantment, that, before we leave this subject, it may not be improper to make a few remarks on such traces of it as may be discovered in the East. The peculiar ideas and habits of a people, as I have often had occasion to observe, may be seen in their Poems and Romances, with a precision not inferior to their more serious and moral Writings; as a Poet of true genius, though he may ascribe to his Heroes more virtues and fewer faults, than are to be found in the imperfect nature of man, will, at the same time, ever copy the living manners of the present or former times. — Single combats in the Shah name, and other Eastern works of fancy, are innumerable. — Asfendiar was one of the most famous warriors in Ancient Persia. He challenges, fights, and kills Arjash, the son of Afrasiab, king of Turan: but being sent by his father against the famous Rostam, after a single combat, which lasts two days, he is killed by the blow of a mace; Rostam having discovered that he had a charm which rendered him invulnerable to spear, sword, or arrow. — Rostam has several duels with his own son Sohrab, whom he did not know; in the last of which he unfortunately kills him. — Those heroes are armed with compleat coats of mail, plumed helmets, spears, swords, maces and shields, with daggers, bows and arrows. Their armour, and the trappings of their horses, are uncommonly splendid: and their mode of attack seems in every shape to have been exactly similar to the tiltings of Knight-errantry: excepting in the circumstance of the bow and arrow; which appears to have been chiefly confined to the infantry, after Chivalry became a regular institution in Europe. — A famous combat is mentioned by all the Persian writers, and seems to be founded on historical fact, between twelve chosen warriors of Persia, and twelve of Tartary. The armies of Kai Khosrou and Afrasiab were drawn up in battle array. To save the effusion of blood, this combat was proposed; the success of which was to fix the boundaries of the hostile empires. The Persians gained the victory, chiefly by the prowess of Rostam; and the Tartar king immediately abandoned all the territory to the southward of the Oxus. Cavun, one of the Persian champions, seems to have been a knight-errant; for he was surnamed Razm khab, One who goes in search of adventures. — Among the Arabians, nothing was more common than challenging to single combat. The Khalif Ali, and others, furnish many examples.—Mention is also made of two famous Arabian Knights-errant, one called Abu Mohammed Al batal, who wandered every where in quest of adventures, and redressing of grievances. He was killed in the year 738. The other was a great grandson of the Khalif Abubeker, named Giaffar al Sadik, who died in the reign of Almanfor, in the year 764—In an imperfect manuscript, which has neither beginning nor end, I met, by chance, with the following anecdote of Giaffar al Sadik. This warrior, who was equally eminent for his piety and extensive knowledge as for his renown in arms, was invited to court by the Khalif Almanfor, that he might profit by his counsel. Giaffar returned for answer, “Whoever has a view only to this world will not give you sincere advice; and he who regards the next will not keep you company.”

THAT mode, which prevailed in Europe, of the knights of hostile armies challenging one another to single combat, during a truce, was very common in the East. I shall give one remarkable instance. The gallant Sultan Jelaeddin, whose father Mohammed, king of Kharezmé, was driven from his dominions by Jengiz Khan, having afterwards recovered part of his kingdom, marched about the year 1228 against the Georgians: when a truce having been agreed upon, in order to adjust, if possible, terms of accommodation, the great men of both armies sent mutual defiance, and many combats were fought. Jelaeddin, disguising himself like a private knight, entered the lists; when a well mounted Georgian appeared against him; but, at the first career, he unhorsed him, and successively three of his sons, who wished to retrieve the family honour. A champion of uncommon size then approached. He was surnamed Pil afkun (Overthrower of elephants). His blows fell with such force and rapidity, that Jelaeddin, apprehensive lest his horse should fly off or sink under him, sprung to the ground; and aimed his lance with such address, that he pierced the Georgian's forehead, and extended him lifeless on the ground.

MANY other circumstances which accompanied the institution of Chivalry in Europe appear to have been long familiar in the East. Tournaments, throwing the javelin, armorial bearings, and, above all, that respectful attention to women which formed no part of the national character of the Greeks or Romans. The exercises of the geridé and the kama were favourite amusements with the young warriors. They darted them at the ring derit; and they tilted, or threw them at one another. The Arabian conquerors of Spain carried the custom into that country; where, under the description of Fiestas de las canas, it is celebrated in the Romanzes, as one of the highest public entertainments which the gallant Moors gave in honour of the Ladies. One cavalier was the public challenger or Mantenedor. He run at the ring, or tilted with all who entered the lists. Gold chains, jewels, and other rich ornaments were the prizes: but the most valuable of all was, the picture of the Mantenedor's mistress; which was placed in a conspicuous part of the field; and surrounded by the portraits of those of the vanquished Knights. The Ladies in galleries which surrounded the lists, were generally witnesses of the address, strength, and fortune of their admirers.

THE attention of the Arabians and Tartars to the Fair Sex seems indeed to have been conducted upon such principles of delicate sensibility, as would hardly be expected from that fierceness of temper, for which they have been characterized. Yet the great lines in the manners of those people may nevertheless, in some measure, account for it. Their attachment to pastoral life, ever favourable to love, with many circumstances peculiar to their roving habits, would frequently produce such situations, as might greatly heighten that elegant regard for the sex, which distinguishes refined affection from brutal impulse. Many tribes are often encamped together; and the young men of one fall naturally in love with the damsels of another. In the midst of their courtship, the heads of the tribes suddenly order the tents to be struck: one goes to the right hand; the other takes the left. The lovers are separated, perhaps never more to meet: and if we can draw any conclusions from their elegies or their language, those separations have been often fatal. Dying for love is considered amongst us as a mere poetic figure; and we certainly can support the reality by few examples: but in Eastern countries it seems to be something more: many words, in the Arabic and Persian languages, which express Love, implying also Melancholy, Madness, and Death.

THE military ideas, which prevailed in old Arabia, seem also to have been peculiarly calculated to promote a romantic attention to the Fair Sex. A long cessation of hostilities was painful to the Arabs: their arms were often turned against the neighbouring countries, and caravans of travellers; but oftener against each other. Captives and plunder were the chief objects; and the women were considered as most valuable spoils. To protect them became in consequence a great point of honour. Those predal wars, in whatever light we may view them, were considered as highly honourable in Arabia; and no man was thought in any shape accomplished, who could not boast, in them, some feat of arms. Their expeditions were in general short. If they found the enemy too powerful, they retired; if unprepared, they surprized them; if of equal or inferior force, they attacked them: and one battle was for the most part decisive. A young warrior returning after a short absence, and laying his laurels, his captives, and his spoils at the feet of his mistress, would, in general, woo with success: and he, whose gallant intrepidity had saved his tribe from rapine and captivity, would ever be a favourite of the fair. When the flower of any tribe were absent upon a distant enterprize, some hostile neighbours would often attack those they had left behind: and hence arose perhaps the custom of the Arabian women, even of the highest rank, attending their husbands, fathers, and brothers in their military expeditions; and of fighting often with a degree of heroism not inferior to the fabled achievements of the ancient Amazons. We have many instances of the fortune of the day having been restored by them after the men had fled: but none more remarkable than the famous battle of Vermouk, fought in the year 636; which proved decisive of the fate of Syria, and of the Greek Empire in the East. The Grecians greatly out-numbered the Arabians; and their onset was so impetuous, that they drove them to their tents. There the fugitives were stopt by the women; who alternately encouraged and reproached them: they threatened even to join the Greeks; and one of their bravest officers appearing disposed for flight, a lady knocked him down with a tent pole; saying, "Advance, Paradise is before your face; fly, and the fire of hell is at your back." The chief women then took the command; and made head till night parted the combatants. The next day they led them again to the attack; a young lady, named Khauia, sister to one of the principal commanders, acting as general. In leading the van she was beat to the ground by a Greek; when Wafira, one of her female friends, striking off his head at a blow, brought the heroine off. Animated by the noble behaviour of the women, the Arabs soon became irresistible, and routed at length the Grecian army, with the loss, it is said, of 150,000 killed, and about 50,000 prisoners. — The Arabian women were, in general, excellent archers; and they watched every opportunity of revenging the death of their husbands, their fathers, their brothers, or their lovers. The governor of Damascus, a man of uncommon abilities and courage, killed with his own hand, in a rally, an Arabian of distinction, named Aban, in the sight of his wife, who fought by his side. She immediately let fly an arrow, which missing the governor, killed the great standard-bearer: with the second she was more successful; she wounded him in the eye, and forced him to retreat to Damascus.

THE Tartars, as we are informed in the History of Abulgasi Khan, used, in the same manner, to carry with them, when they went even upon short expeditions, their wives and families, for the reasons mentioned above; as that weaker sex must, otherwise, have remained, in the absence of the warriors, a prey to invading neighbours.—Tamerlane, in the intervals between his expeditions, used to assemble all the young females of the army, and order a general marriage; which he solemnized with uncommon magnificence. After the defeat of the Kipjaks about the year 1389, that prince gave a most pompous feast in the delightful plains near Samarcand, on the marriage of his emirs, his inferior officers, and his soldiers; which was introduced by a grand piece of music composed on the occasion, called the Triumph of Kipjak. He was seated on a throne of gold: rich carpets and brocades overspread the ground: and tables in various dispositions were ranged around to an immense distance: those of the great Emirs being placed next to the throne; and the subordinate officers and soldiers seated according to their respective ranks, marshalled in battle array; the bridegrooms on one side, and the brides on the other. Those gallant entertainments, which were accompanied with tournaments, huntings, and various hardy sports, co-incided perfectly with the genius of his people. They often continued many days; for all the great Khans were ambitious of imitating the splendor of their sovereign: and he took pains to encourage their ruling passion. No prince was ever more generous to those who served him well: yet he knew the secret of keeping even the richest dependent on his bounty; and Luxury was the master-key. War and the Ladies he knew were the great objects of their adoration. They fought and they plundered, only to be gallant and magnificent.

THE marriage of a prince among the Tartars was attended with singular splendor and ceremony. I shall not dwell upon numberless instances which might be brought from the Histories of Jengiz Khan, Tamerlane, Abulgasi, and other Tartar annals, but shall only remark a pompous custom, mentioned by the Vizir Nezam, which I have met with in no other author. It is introduced when occasionally mentioning some particulars of the marriage of his sovereign, the Sultan Malekshah, with the daughter of the Khalif. "The Sultan was encamped on the west side of the Tigris; and the Khalif's palace was on the east. On the day chosen for the ceremony, the Sultan gave orders that all the Great Men who were present should go to the palace of the Khalif to solicit his consent: for according to the custom of the Turcomans, at the time of the courtship the Bridegroom's people go to the father of the future Bride; and in a supplicating “ manner request him to give his consent to the “ match. In like manner, the great men, then “ assembled from most parts of the earth, went “ in procession to supplicate the Khalif: and, to “ show the regard due to his palace, directions “ were given, that they should all go thither on “ foot. When they began to march, the Kha-“ lif, who had notice of their motion, imme“ diately sent a messenger, who said, that the “ Commander of the Faithful had ordered Ne- “ zam ul mulk to come on horseback. So I “ alone mounted; and all the great men of the “ world accompanied me on foot. On our arri“ val at the palace, I was introduced into a “ most magnificent hall: and seated on an emi“ nent place: and all the rest on my right and “ left. Then robes of honour were brought for “ all of us: and on that for me was curiously “ wrought the following words, For the Wise

 “ and Just Vizir Nezam ul Mulk, Emiru'l'mou- “ minin. And from the beginning of Moham“ medanism to this day no Vizir has been dig“ nified with the title of Prince of the Faith“ ful.”—The high respect paid by the Tartars to the Sex might indeed be supported upon many grounds.—If a Tartar chief married several wives,
 the sons of the lady, who was most nobly born,
 took precedence of their brothers, whose mothers were of inferior rank. It is particularly remarked, as a general Mogul custom, by Abulpharaj, when mentioning the sons of Jengiz Khan, by his principal queen Owisunjin Begi; and seems to be a stretch of complaisance unknown even in our European laws.—The Vizir Nezam advises his son, if he accepts the Vizirship, to pay uncommon attention to the Ladies of the court, for the following reason: “ Although, in old times, “ especially during the reigns of the ancient “ Kings of Persia, no great regard was paid to “ the opinion of the Queens in matters of state;
 “ yet the Khans of Turkestan had always a cus“ tom of consulting the women on all emer“ gencies; and preferred their opinions to that “ of all their counsellors: and as the Turcoman
 “ princes were originally educated among them,
 “ they likewise follow this custom; and trust
 “ to their prudent advice on all occasions. It is “ therefore absolutely necessary that you take “ shelter under their protection.” As Nezam always illustrates his advice by some anecdote from History, or his own observation, he, upon this occasion, gives some instances of the great influence and address of a lady called Jemila Can- dahari, the favourite attendant on the young Tartar queen of Sultan Mahmoud; who appears, from the account of this penetrating statesman, to have been the chief though secret spring of every ministerial movement. She was handsome; and endowed with uncommon parts: she was a steady friend, and a determined but not a cruel enemy. She protected her favourites in the most dangerous situations; and hurled, with a sure but invisible arm, disappointment and disgrace on the heads of those who wished to rise upon their ruin. *

BUT this preliminary dissertation has already swelled to an uncommon size; and might easily equal the volume to which it is prefixed, were every custom, singular in itself, or similar to those of Europe, touched upon and supported by all the authorities which might be brought: but that I must leave to men of higher abilities, with greater leisure, who may chuse to pursue the subject;
 and conclude, with a few miscellaneous observations, on some points, which have not found a place in the preceding sheets. †

I HAVE mentioned above a musical composition performed before Tamerlane, called the Tri- umph of Kipjak; but I have had no opportunity of discovering any thing satisfactory of the genius of the Tartar, Persian, or Arabian music. They have however three principal perdes or modes; called the Isphahani, which appears to be the original Persian melody; the Iraki or the Babylonish; and the Hejazi or the Arabian: which have probably an analogy and a difference, similar to that which is found between the aboriginal music of England, Scotland, and Ireland. Their stile is apparently not very remote from that which prevailed in Europe before the eleventh century; when Guido and others began to improve the Italian taste. Simple melody seems to be their only object; without any idea of composition in score, or of harmonic accompaniment; excepting what may be produced, by the concord of a deep-toned instrument playing the same piece along with another tuned a single or a double octave higher.
 But this approaches so near to unison, as hardly to suggest any idea of that variety introduced by thirds, fifths, and the other less perfect chords;
 which so remarkably distinguishes the present
 European system from that of the ancients. —
 The Asiatics have a great number of instruments;
 and many of those now in use amongst us, though considerably improved, appear to have been originally of Eastern invention. One of their most favourite instruments is called the Barbut; a species of lute, which is said to have been invented by a famous musician of that name, who was master to Khosrou Parviz, king of Persia, about the end of the sixth century: but it is probable that he only improved it; and was perhaps so surnamed, from his excellent performance on the instrument. For the Barbiton, which, in name and description, seems to have borne a great resemblance to it, was known to the Greeks;
 though it might possibly have been originally brought from Persia; Strabo observing, that it was so named as being borrowed from Barbarians.
 Among the Eastern nations we find a variety of instruments of this species; which bear a proportion, in point of size, similar to that of the violin, tenor, and violoncello, in Europe. The Aber seems to be a common lute; the Sili is described with a large swelling belly, and a deep tone. The Shahshab is a four-stringed instrument, somewhat like a violoncello. The Yenem is another large instrument strung with brass wires, and struck with a short plectrum; the Yeshkirdé being somewhat similar, but played with a long bow. The Shefta has six strings, and is of the same species with the Kitar; whence our guitar, from the Spanish guitarra, seems to have been borrowed: as it was a favourite instrument with the Arabian conquerors of Spain; who seem not only to have introduced it, but also the gallant custom of serenading their mistresses: on which occasion, not only the words of their songs, but the airs, and even the colour of their habits, were expressive of the triumph of the fortunate, or the despair of the rejected lover. *

BESIDES the above instruments, they have the Kiran, the Mizher, the Kanun or Kenin, the Kemanché, the Kenaret, the Arteh, the Tunbur, the Zentur, the Kendelash, and several others, which are different kinds of the lute, harp, dulcimer, psalter, viola d'amore, and other instruments of the stringed species. The Kunjbad appears to be the Eolian or wind harp; the Tulumbé is a hydraulic instrument or water-organ; Miskal, a species of organ, or Pan's reed-pipe of unequal lengths. Drums are apparently an Arabian invention, and they have them of many sorts. Teb is a drum, Tebek a small drum, tabor, or tambourin; also one made of two kettles, joined bottom to bottom, and covered with skins; Ruyim khun, Sitam, Kubé, are other kinds of kettle drums. Duff, Dubdub, Tembel, Dereb, Shendef, Shedef, with many more, are drums, tabors, and other similar instruments. Kus is a large royal military drum, generally beat in the palace, or in the camp when the king is present. They have likewise a vast number wind instruments, especially for war and the chase; as the Gawdum, a trumpet, with which they sound the charge to battle; the Buk or Buri, a kind of Clarion, or Cor de chasse. The Shebir, the Nefir, the Naker, the Kerna or Kerenmay, are trumpets of different kinds: the last was that used by Tamerlane; the sound of which is described as uncommonly dreadful; and so loud as to be heard at the distance of several miles. The Nei, the Zarna, the Keisabes, the Shaben, the Neidil, the Neishé, the Kawwal, and the Sanai, are all of the hautboy, pipe, or flute species; though apparently not so melodious in general as those of Europe. As the last mentioned instrument, from the number of holes, seems to require some art to perform upon it with propriety, I shall conclude with a short description of it. It is shaped somewhat like a hautboy, without keys: it has a brass mouth-piece and fifteen holes; seven in a right line, ranged nearly like those of that instrument; three smaller ones towards the lower extremity; two on each side, and one of a larger dimension near the bottom. The Sanai is of different sizes; some are of wood, and others of metal: but that which is least offensive to a stranger's ear, has the upper part of wood, and the lower of thin brass. It has a shrill piercing sound. *

THE Persians appear to have been the most musical of the Eastern nations; the Arabians themselves, who have written many treatises on the subject, acknowledging, that they had borrowed from them the greatest part of their knowledge, and many of their terms of art. Father Angelo mentions having seen several beautiful musical manuscripts at Isphahan, some of which were brought into Europe, and placed in the library of Louis XIV. by his Oriental interpreter M. Petis Le Croix.—The great men in the East have been always fond of music. Tho' prohibited by the Mohammedan religion, it in general makes part of every public or private entertainment. Female slaves are generally kept to amuse them, and the ladies of their Harams. Female strolling musicians are also very common; and the Persian Khanyageré seems nearly to have resembled our old English Minstrel; as he generally accompanied his Barbut or lute with heroic songs.—Their musicians appear, like old Timothy, to have known the art of moving the passions, and to have generally directed their music to the heart. I shall mention one instance. Alfarabi, who died about the middle of the tenth century, was a philosopher of uncommon genius; and, amongst other accomplishments, he excelled in music. On his return from the pilgrimage to Mecca, he introduced himself, though a stranger, at the court of Seifeddoula, Sultan of Syria. Musicians were accidentally performing, and he joined them. The prince admired him, and, wished to hear something of his own. He pulled a composition from his pocket, and distributing the parts amongst the band, the first movement threw the prince and his courtiers into violent and incessant laughter; the next melted all into tears; and the last lulled even the performers asleep. *

A VARIETY of customs, we may here observe, prevailed amongst the independent tribes of Pagan Arabians and Tartars, which were either abolished or modified, when they became united under princes of ability and power. One of these was the destructive system of Private War. In every state where the arm of the civil magistrate has been too feeble to check or chastise the crimes of men, private revenge seems naturally to have usurped the place of legal punishment. We find it in full vigour in the middle ages, and universally adopted in every European state. And so forcible is the prejudice of ancient habit, that even where sovereigns gained strength sufficient, to substitute the laws of reason for the practices of barbarity, they found it not prudent to overturn at once this pernicious offspring of uncultivated minds: but, by loading it with expensive compositions, they endeavoured to make its ravages less hurtful to society. Similar but more savage principles appear to have regulated those Eastern nations. If an Arabian had lost a near relation, a wife, or even a slave, he singled out from among the Captives, when victorious, a freeman for each, and sacrificed them in cold blood. This was not considered as barbarous: it was rather a point of honour; which avarice alone appears to have mitigated: the husband, relations, or master of the deceased, being permitted to dispense with their sanguinary vengeance, in consideration of a mulct. We accordingly find, about the birth of Mohammed, that ten camels were the compensation for a slaughtered man; without any apparent distinction between the freeman and the slave. Mohammed, powerful as he was, durst not, any more than the lawgivers of Europe, so far oppose the general genius of the people, as entirely to abolish this brutal custom: but he endeavoured to mitigate or regulate it by several passages in the Alcoran; in which, among other circumstances, a distinction is made of rank and sex. In after-times, the composition of ten camels was found inadequate to check the prevalence of private vengeance: and, in the Sonna, it was accordingly raised to a hundred: probably for the same reasons which dictated an increase of the sanguinary fines among the Lombards and other European nations: because those fines having been originally fixed when the people were poor, they were found too trifling, when, by the extent of their conquests, they had become powerful and rich. It does not however appear, that any thing similar to the European Fredum, or proportion paid to the public treasury, subsisted among the Eastern nations; the whole of the compensation being received by the relations or master of the slaughtered person. In the East, as well as in Europe, the relations of the principals in a quarrel seem to have been bound by honour and custom to espouse their party, and to revenge their death; one of the highest reproaches, with which one Arabian could upbraid another, being an accusation of having left the blood of his friend unrevenged. The sacred months of the Arabians appear to have been far superior to the Treuga Dei or the Pax Regis of Europe. Three following months in every year, with another one intermediate, must have tended far more effectually to soften exasperated minds, than the interval of three days in a week; which would, in general, only give them a breathing time to prepare for fresh hostilities. Those European ordinances were, at the same time, too often disregarded; whilst in Arabia, they took the heads from their spears, and observed this great salutary law so religiously, that from the earliest periods of record or tradition, they furnished but four or five instances where it had been infringed; and these were stamped with the epithet of impiety, and the universal execration of the people.

ONE circumstance, however, appears strongly to have distinguished the private wars in the East from those of the West. The manners of Asia seem, in all ages, to have pointed to domestic slavery: and Mohammed, in Arabia, made that an article of religion, which had anciently been only a custom. The Captives were, in consequence, with few exceptions, constantly reduced to a state of servitude; and little distinction seems, in general, to have been made between a princess and her female slave; excepting what she derived from a superiority of personal accomplishments. Those ideas the Arabians retained amidst their extensive conquests. Many instances might be given; I shall confine myself to two; as they regard the daughters of the two greatest princes then in the world.—In an action after the siege of Damascus, in 635, amongst other prisoners was the daughter of Heraclius, Emperor of Greece, and widow of the Governor of that city. Rasi, the Arabian commander, to whose lot she fell, presented her, without ceremony, as a slave, to Jonas, a Grecian, who had embraced the Mohammedan religion; but Jonas, from a principle of honour, returned her, with all her jewels, unransomed to her father.—When the Arabians conquered Persia, Shirin banu, the daughter of king Yezdejird, was one of the captives, and was publicly exposed to sale in the city of Medina; but the liberal-minded Ali thought differently from his countrymen on this occasion: he declared, that the offspring of princes ought not to be sold; and married her immediately to his son Hossain. This anecdote I met with in the mutilated manuscript, formerly mentioned, the author of which I have not been able to discover. Ismael Sefi, who mounted the throne of Persia in the year 1502, derived his descent, as observed before, (p. xv.) from the Khalif Ali; and as he also claimed relationship to the ancient royal family of Persia, it was probably in consequence of this marriage. What may serve to confirm this anecdote, is a story related of the Khalif Al Walid, and the Imam Zein Alabdin, son of Hossain, whom he suspected of a design upon the Khalifat. “You are unworthy to reign,” said Al Walid, as being the son of a “slave: your mother was one of the Persian captives.” The Imam answered, “The mother of Ismael, the son of Abraham, was the slave Hagar; yet Mohammed was descended from her.” The Khalif blushed, and was silent.

THE Tartars, in the circumstance of private war, resembled, in many particulars, the old Arabians; in some they differed. The whole history of Abulgazi Khan is filled with the incessant wars of the various tribes. The domestic slavery of the men was, indeed, seldom adopted. They either massacred them, or sent them into distant exile: but the women were made captives. Abulgazi mentions particularly, when the princes of the tribe of Amunak, about the year 1504, defeated the posterity of Burga Sultan, one of the descendants of Jengiz Khan, that they put to death all the males of that house; but their wives and daughters they kept as slaves. When they spared their prisoners, and either set them at liberty, or removed them to another country, they divided them into small troops of ten or twelve; each of which furnished one, as a hostage for the good behaviour of the rest. A similar custom prevailed of old among the Germans.*

AMIDST all the vices and dangerous qualities of the Arabians, Persians, and Tartars, they have been ever distinguished for generosity and hospitality. Particular details would be endless; they are to be found in almost every author who has touched upon the history of those people. I shall only observe, in addition to those accounts, that there is hardly a word in the Arabic and Persian languages which signifies Avarice, that does not also imply Cowardice, baseness, slavery, or villainy. The Arabians have even a proverb, that no Miser was ever brave, but the Khalif Abdalla ben Zobair. So high is their idea of the rights of hospitality, that if the murderer of their dearest friends had, even by chance, eaten or drunk under their roof, that alone cancelled every former crime; and they were bound not only to forgive but to protect him. The wretch, who had betrayed the man, whose bread he had eaten, was justly stamped with the deepest infamy; a Bread and Salt Traitor being one of the most opprobrious epithets by which one Asiatic could express his detestation of another.—Their veneration for Salt is indeed extraordinary. A robber having one night broke into the palace of the king of Sejestan; and happening, whilst he was making off with his rich booty, to tread upon a stone, which he conceived to be a jewel that had escaped his observation in the dark, he picked it up; and, putting it to his mouth, to be satisfied of the truth, he found it to be salt. This accidental circumstance operated so forcibly, even with this loose-principled man, that he, then considered his robbery as a violation of the rights of hospitality; and retired immediately home without his plunder. This famous robber became afterwards king of Sejestan, and founder of the dynasty of the Soffarides.—A custom subsists to this day in India, among the Gentoos, of tasting Salt, together with other ceremonies, when dividing property among partners, or the heirs of a person deceased.

AMONGST other laws and usages, similar to those of the Northern nations, we find, that the trial by Ordeal was anciently known in Persia; and it originated perhaps from their superstitious veneration for Fire. After exalting that element to the rank of a divinity, we cannot wonder that they should resort to it, for evidence, in points which could not admit of positive proof. In the Shah namé we find the description of an illustrious trial, by the Ordeal, above five hundred years before the Christian era. Siavekhsh, son of the reigning king Kai Caus, had been educated in Sejestan by the great Rostam. His father, hearing much of his accomplishments, sent for him to court; where Saudabé, his mother-in-law, fell in love with him. She soon made a declaration; but, the prince discouraging her advances, she flew in a rage to the king, and accused him of an attempt upon her honour. The prince protested his innocence; but the queen persisted, and demanded justice. The king knew not how to decide; the nature of the case could not admit of proof. He ordered, therefore, a large fire to be kindled, and the parties to pass through it. The prince, without hesitation, boldly entered it on horseback, and passed unhurt. But Saudabé trembled, and durst not venture: she fell on her knees, confessed the truth, and was pardoned on the generous intercession of the man she meant to destroy.—The trial by Ordeal, where satisfactory evidence cannot be obtained, is still in practice among the Gentoos in Hindostan; and is of high antiquity. It is mentioned several times in the Code of Gentoo Laws, as a common mode of proof, under the title of Purrikeh: but I have not been able to discover the particular species which they adopt.*

THE administration of justice in Pagan Arabia appears to have been very simple; the heads of the tribes being, in general, the umpires of every difference. Solemn oaths used to be taken over a fire called hawlet; into which, if they suspected a witness of perjury, they privately threw a species of salt; which making a sudden explosion, terrified him often into a discovery of the truth. Over a fire they used also to make treaties and other solemn agreements.—After Mohammed had established his prophetic character, causes appear to have been determined only by him and his chief companions: and their decrees were sometimes strikingly decisive. A Mohammedan being cast in a suit with a Jew before the tribunal of the Prophet, appealed to Omar; who happened to be standing at his door when the parties appeared. After listening to the merits with great composure, he bid them wait a little, and he would soon settle the whole affair. He then went into his house, and returning instantly with a sword, struck off the Mohammedan's head: "Thus, says he, ought all to be punished, who acquiesce not in the sentence of the prophet of God."*

I FOUND a decision of Ali, in the imperfect manuscript formerly mentioned, which seems ingenious, and shows, at the same time, something of the manners of the people in those times. Two Arabians sat down to dinner: one had five loaves, the other three. A stranger passing by, desired permission to eat with them; which they agreed to. The stranger dined, laid down eight pieces of money, and departed. The proprietor of the five loaves took up five pieces, and left three for the other; who objected, and insisted for one half. The cause came before Ali, who gave the following judgment: "Let the owner of the five loaves have seven pieces of money, and the owner of the three loaves, one: for if we divide the eight loaves by three, they make twenty-four parts; of which he who laid down five loaves, had fifteen; whilst he who laid down three, had only nine: as all fared alike, and eight shares was each man's proportion, the stranger ate seven parts of the first man's property, and only one belonging to the other: the money, in justice, must be divided accordingly."—In after-times, in the various Mohammedan states, the Law appears however to have been strangely perverted; and the satirists are, in consequence, uncommonly severe. "Formerly, says a poet, the judges were naked swords, and the guilty only trembled; now they are empty sheaths, and gorge themselves with the plunder of their suitors.—Are you indigent, says another; and have you the misfortune to be at law with the rich: withdraw your suit; go to your powerful oppressor, and humble yourself in the dust: there you may perhaps meet with justice and mercy: with the Cadhi you can have none." And in fact no censure appears ever to have been more justly grounded; for in the Eastern languages, there are not only words signifying Bribes to Judges; but others, which denote Men whose public and professed employment was, The corrupting of magistrates, to procure decisions contrary to equity and law. We may form indeed a judgment of the general administration, or rather perversion, of justice, under some of the Khalifs, from an appointment of Moctader; who, about the beginning of the tenth century, promoted a young damsel, named Yemika, to be president of the Diwanu'l mezalim, one of the principal tribunals of the empire; which took cognizance of the tyranny and oppression of governors and other great men. *

THE following curious anecdote is told, in the Negaristan, of a famous lawyer of Baghdad, called Abu Joseph. It marks several peculiarities in the Mohammedan law, and displays some casuistical ingenuity in adapting them to the views of his clients. The Khalif Haron Arrashid had taken a fancy for a female slave belonging to his brother Ibrahim. He offered to purchase her; but Ibrahim, though willing to oblige his sovereign, had sworn, that he would neither sell nor give her away. As all parties wished to remove this difficulty, Abu Joseph was consulted; who advised Ibrahim to give his brother one half of the slave, and to sell him the other. Happy to be relieved from this embarrassment, the Khalif ordered 30,000 dinars for the moiety of the slave; which Ibrahim, as a mark of his acknowledgement, immediately presented to the lawyer. But a second difficulty now arose. The Moslem law prohibits all commerce between a man and the wife or concubine of his brother, till she has been re-married and divorced by a third person. Abu Joseph advised the Khalif to marry her to one of his slaves; who, for a proper consideration, would be easily induced to repudiate her on the spot. The ceremony was instantly performed: but the slave, falling in love with his handsome spouse, could not be prevailed upon to consent to a separation. Here was a strange and unexpected dilemma; for, all despotic as the Khalif was, he durst not compel him. But Abu Joseph soon discovered an expedient. He desired the Khalif to make a present to the lady of her new husband, which virtually dissolved the marriage; as no woman, by the Mohammedan law, can be the wife of her own slave. Overjoyed that the Gordian knot was thus so ingeniously unloosed, the Khalif gave him 10,000 dinars; and the fair slave receiving a considerable present from her royal lover, presented him with 10,000 more: so that Abu Joseph, in a few hours, found his fees amount to 50,000 dinars, or nearly 25,000 l. *

To those strictures many might be added: but I am already led too far; and time obliges me to conclude. The subjects touched upon, in this Dissertation, are various; and some of them may be discovered, perhaps, to have been too slightly considered. I have differed freely from very high authorities; but, sensible how much easier it is to point out errors than to avoid them, I submit myself as freely to the decision of every intelligent reader. Be it delivered with the temper of the gentleman and the scholar, I shall be proud of every ingenious criticism; and endeavour to improve by a discovery of my faults. I am not attached to a single idea that may be found inconsistent with truth or propriety; and should, with far less pain, see the most favourite theory fall before a judicious investigation, than be justly censured for a failure in candour or politeness.

PROOFS and ILLUSTRATIONS.

AMONGST other proofs which I propose to offer in the course of this disquisition, one appears to me to be of high authority; I mean radical words in the Eastern tongues, expressive of peculiar habits, or inventions; the existence of the terms being positive evidence of the pre-existence of the objects which they describe. In this mode of proof I shall advance no words which appear to have been adopted from the Grecian or other foreign languages; as these could demonstrate no originality: and I shall avoid all circumlocutory description, as that can prove no antiquity. Whatever is expressed by a number of words, we shall, for the most part find, is neither perfectly nor generally known: it is only when the idea has become familiar, that the superfluity of phrase is dropt, and the principal word becomes sufficient to make the whole completely understood.

PAGE 1.] * St. Ephraim and St. Basil insist strongly, that the Aramean or Mesopotamian dialect of the Syriac, was that in which God delivered his commands to Adam; the Maronites, or Eastern Christians, contend for the Chaldaic; James Bishop of Roha, Bochart, and others, give the precedence to the Hebrew; Eutyclus supports the Greek; Mr. Webb the Chinese; Goropius Becanus and Pezron are warm for the Teutonic; whilst Gregory Nyssa declares his antagonist Eunomius an impious heretic, for supposing Man to have received any language whatever from God. See also D'Herbelot Bibliothèque Orientale, p. 514. Sharpe on the Origin of Languages, p. 2. 6. &c.

The learned Bochart has given us a list of about twenty languages, supposed to have been in use in very early ages; and has arranged them, with regard to antiquity, in the following order: The Hebrew, the Chaldaic or Syriac, the Arabic, Phœnician, Egyptian, the Azotian or Philistine, the Persian Parthian, Median, Elamite, Cappadocian, Pontic, Asiatic, Phrygian, Pamphiliian, Libyan, Cretan; and Lycoanic, together with the Greek and Latin; all of which (the three first, the Persian, and two last excepted) were, probably, only dialects of the principal tongues. PAGE III. (*) Pocock, in his preface to the Carmen Tograi, mentions a circumstance which may give some idea of the pains which the Arabians have taken with their language. A king having sent to a grammarian for the books in his possession relative to that tongue, he desired the messenger to inform the monarch, that, if he wished to have them, he must send sixty camels to carry the dictionaries alone.

(*) By Pliny, Zoroaster is called a Proconnesian; by Suidas, an Assyrian and a Medo-Persian; by others, he is stiled a Pamphylian, an Armenian, a Bactrian, an Indian, and a Chinese. His era is still more wide of possibility than his birth-place: Pliny (l. 30. c. 1.) places him thousands of years before Moses: Hermodorus Platonicus, Hermippus, and Plutarch, 5000 years before the siege of Troy: Suidas, only 500 years before that period: Eudoxas, 6000 years before the death of Plato (which happened about 350 B. C.): Xanthus Lydius, 600 years before Darius Hytaspes: Justin, 1300 years before Sardanapalus: whilst others fix him in the days of Ninus and Semiramis, who seem to be equally undefined with himself. Some Eastern writers place Zerdusht 1300 years after the flood: some make him the disciple of Elija or Elisha, others of Ozair, Ezra, or Esdras: Some consider him as Abraham: others as the usurper Zohak: and M. D'Herbelot, (from the name Mikhouf, which occurs in the Tarikh Montekheb), conceives him, by a stretch of fancy, to have been Smerdus Magus. But the greater number make him cotemporary with Kishtasb, king of Persia; and, consequently, suppose him to have lived about 500 years before the Christian era. See also D'Herbelot, p. 932. PAGE IV. * The Arabic words Dounia the world; Min din from religion; Zeman time; Sanat a year; Molk a king; Ganm cattle; Lelia night; Ab a father; Am a mother; Zamam compleated; and a variety more occur repeatedly in different parts of M. Anquetil's Zend Avesta. The following and similar words could hardly ever have been articulated by a Persian: Rethvanmtché, Khschetreiao, Iaerienmtché, Thvorefchtara, Veretrehmbetché. For the satisfaction, of those who are conversant with the modern Persian, I shall here insert the beginning of the Vendidad Sadé, with the Latin translation which M. Anquetil has annexed; and leave them to determine whether, (one or two modern words excepted) there subsists the least affinity between them.

The Persian, in point of regularity, is perhaps not to be excelled by any language in the world. As one general rule, the third person of the present tense ends in د d, the only exceptions, which I can at present recollect, being است est and هست hest, He is. In the Zend, on the contrary, the terminations of this person are irregular to the last degree. I shall mention a few examples. Ashti, Enghem, Eoued, Heeté, Beouad, Il est. Eenetôed, Eenetôesch, Apeouetecé, Il connoit. Djemad, Gueteen, Il vient. Djemeeté Il arrive. Djeto, Gbnad Il frappe. Snes Il frappe; il brule. Veiozofchtao Il fait. Eshto Il s'applique. Refo Il arrange. Guethad Il saute. Mostemescho Il meurt.—In which few words, exclusive of the want of similarity in the penults and antepenults, there are no less than eight variations in the final letters. Were it of consequence, many more could be brought.

^b Ormuzd (Omnipotence) and Zoroaster are introduced in dialogue. The lawgiver wishes to know how a man should get rid of a demon called Daroudj Nefosch, supposing him, in the shape of a fly, to have taken possession of the crown of his head; Ormuzd directs him to wash the part, which would drive the fiend between the eye-brows; from thence he is to be forced, by another ablution, to the back of the head; from that to the ear, then to the nose, the mouth, the chin; till at length, fighting every inch of ground, the poor devil is successively driven over every part of the body, till we find him stationed on the left foot; when Zoroaster thus proceeds in his catechism; (what is between hooks being M. Anquetil's explanatory interpolations, and not in the original).

"Lorsque l'eau a atteint le dessus du pied gauche où se retire le Daroudj Nefosch? Ormuzd répondit: (le Daroudj Nefosch) sous la forme d'une mouche se place dessous le pied; il faut le lever, laissant les doigts poser à terre, et laver ainsi le dessous du pied droit. Lorsque l'on a lavé le dessous du pied droit, le Daroudj Nefosch se retire sous le pied gauche. Lorsque l'on a lavé le dessous du pied gauche le Daroudj Nefosch sous la forme d'une mouche, se place dessous les doigts. Laisant donc (poser à terre) le dessous du pied, on leve les doigts, et on lave ceux (du pied) droit. Lorsque l'on a lavé les doigts du pied droit, le Daroudj Nefosch se retire sous ceux (du pied) gauche; et lorsqu'on a lavé les doigts du pied gauche, le Daroudj Nefosch est renversé (vaincu et s'en retourne) du côté du Nord, lui qui, sous la forme d'une mouche, se place sur (l'homme impur) et le frappe comme le Djodje (chien) des deserts, détruit les productions des Dews et leurs demeurs," &c.

When the water has reached the top of the left foot, where does the Daroudj Nefosch retire? Ormuzd replied: (The Daroudj Nefosch) under the form of a fly, places himself under the foot; it must be raised, letting the toes rest on the ground, and thus wash the under part of the right foot. When the under part of the right foot is washed, the Daroudj Nefosch retires under the left foot. When the under part of the left foot is washed, the Daroudj Nefosch, in the form of a fly, places himself under the toes. Allowing the sole of the foot (to rest upon the ground) the toes must be raised, and those of the right (foot) washed. When the toes of the right foot are washed, the Daroudj Nefosch retires under those of the left (foot); and when the toes of the left foot are washed, the Daroudj Nefosch is overthrown (conquered, and returns) towards the north, he who under the shape of a fly places himself upon (the impure man) and strikes him like the Djodje (dog) of the desert, destroys the productions of the Dews and their dwellings, &c. Zend Avesta par M. Anquetil du Perron, Vol. I. part. ii. p. 341. — Can human credulity suppose this to be the composition of Zoroaster, or of any man who had pretensions to common sense?

^c In the preface to the Farhang Jehanguiri we are informed, that it was not reckoned elegant in the Deri to use syncopes; the following or similar words being never admitted, as کو (speak thou), رو (go thou), فزودن (to increase), &c. they being always written بکو and برو, افزودن. The softness of this language, in the opinion of the Asiatics, may be learnt from a popular saying, reported by Ebn Fekreddin Anju, author of the above Dictionary, "That the Deri and the Arabic idioms were the languages of heaven: God communicating to the angels his milder mandates in the delicate accents of the first; whilst his stern commands were delivered in the rapid utterance of the other."

Bahaman or Ardesfir Dirazdest is generally supposed to be Artaxerxes Macrocheir or Longimanus. Ardesfir Dirazdest implies The strong lion with the long hands; an epithet supposed to have been given him on account of the greatness of his power and the extent of his empire. Baharam was contemporary with Theodosius II. emperor of Greece, and is known in Europe by the name of Varanes or Vararanes.

PAGE v. ^a Ardesfir Babegan having entertained some doubts relative to the national religion, ordered the chief priests of the Magi to attend, in order to have them explained; when the king, on proposing his doubts, delivered himself as follows:

نمایند ان بمن تا شك زكبهان
كنم دور و هاديرم دين يزدان
همي خواهم كي زان برهان نمايند
حققت بر همه كههان نمايند

Numayend an bemen ta shek zegeihan

I may drive far off, and embrace the religion of God.

I wish that by this decision they would show

The truth; to all the world show it.

N. B. هاديرم in the second line is either an old word, now obsolete, or an error; if the last, it may be corrected by substituting پذيرم or كبرم, or some such synonymous word, See Hyde's Religio Veterum Persarum, p. 18. It may be proper to observe, that, in the Old Persian mode of writing, every vowel has a distinct character: to write in that manner, the above would run as follows;

نومایند ان بامان تا شك زكبهان
كونام دور و هاديرام دين يزدان
هامبي خواهم كي زان برهان نومایند
هاققت بار هامة كههان نومایند

All the other passages scattered through the Religio, as Old Persian, are, like the above, simply the modern language in ancient characters.

^b It is astonishing to consider the numbers of mistakes into which, in the various lines of literature, the best of our European authors are led, by their inattention to the languages and writings of the East. Mariana, the chief historian of Spain, when introducing the Arabian conquest of that country, with an account of the Mohammedan religion, says, "Fundador de aquella malvada supersticion fue Mahoma Arabe de nacion: el qual por la mucha prosperidad que tuvo en las guerras, y por descuydo del emperador Heraclio, se llamó y coronò rey de su nacion, en Damasco, nobilissima ciudad de la Syria, &c." Vid. tomo primero, p. 311. "The founder of this accursed superstition was Mahomet, an Arabian by birth, who, in consequence of his great success in war, and the negligence of the emperor Heraclius, declared himself king of his nation, and was crowned in Damascus, the most noble city of Syria." — In an event of some importance to the history of Spain, a Spanish historian should have been better informed: but Mohammed never assumed the dignity of king, and never was at Damascus, nor out of Arabia from the period of his appearance in his prophetic character, excepting in the ninth year of the Hejra (A. D. 630.) when he advanced no farther than Tabuc, half way between Medina and Damascus, and returned after a residence of only three weeks.—Dr. Hyde erroneously places the Persian conquest under the reign of Othman, A. D. 646. See Religio Vet. Pers. p. 23. See also Dictionary سال

P. vii. * The Khalif Al Tai revived in favour of Azadud-dowla the title of شاهنشاه Shahinſhab, which was borne by the ancient kings of Perſia. See Erpenius's edition of Tarikh ul muſlemin, or Hiſtoria Saracenicæ, p. 237.—See alſo Dictionary under امير emir.

* See Dictionary شاه نامه Shah namé. Father Angelo, author of the Gazophylacium Linguae Perſarum, who went a miſſionary to the Eaſt in 1663, ſays, (p. 199) that the language of the Shah namé is conſidered, in Perſia, as the idiom of their ancient kings and heroes; and that it is ſtill ſpoken in the province of Shirvan, near the Caſpian Sea, by a people who live in tents. This, if authentic, furniſhes another ſtrong argument, that all the difference between the Ancient and Modern dialects, conſiſts entirely in a diverſity of character, and in the preſent intermixture of the Arabic.

* The Eaſtern princes ſeem to have carried their attachment to men of genius to a very ſingular exceſs: imprifoning them even when they ſuſpected them of an intention to retire. If happened to eſcape, an embaſſy with preſents and apologies ſometimes followed the man of learning; and peremptory demands were often made, where gentler methods had not the deſired effect: a demand however ſeldom complied with, if the power of the ſovereigns with whom they had taken refuge, bore any proportion to that of their competitors. I ſhall mention two examples. Khakani, a celebrated Perſian poet of the twelfth century, was a great favourite with the Sultan of Shirvan; but becoming at laſt diſguſted with the world, he deſired leave to retire into the religious order of the Derviſhes. The Sultan reſuſing him permiſſion, he fled; but was purſued, brought back, and imprifoned for ſeveral months. Here he compoſed one of his fineſt elegies: but he was at length ſet at liberty; and ſoon after obtained leave to put his deſign in execution.—Mahmoud, Sultan of Ghezna, having invited ſome men of genius from the court of his ſon-in-law, the king of Kharezmé, the celebrated Avicenna, who was of the number, reſuſed to go; and retired to the capital of the Sultan of Jorjan.—Mahmoud ordered immediately a number of portraits of this great phyſician to be copied; and ſent them all around, in order to diſcover his retreat. The fame of his cures had, in the mean time, reached the Sultan of Jorjan; who ſent for him to viſit a favourite nephew, whoſe malady had perplexed the faculty. Avicenna ſuppoſed it to be concealed love: and, in the idea that the fair object might be one of the ladies of the king's Haram, he deſired the chamberlain to deſcribe the curioſities of the palace, whiſt he felt the prince's pulse. On the mention of a particular apartment, he perceived an uncommon emotion in his patient; but the naming of the lady, who lived in it, entirely removed his doubts. The ſequel is a perfect counterpart of the famous ſtory of Antiochus and Stratonice: the prince was made happy. The king conceiving a great deſire to ſee a phyſician of ſuch penetrating genius, ſent for him; and diſcovered him the moment he appeared, by one of the portraits which he had received from Sultan Mahmoud. But no menaces could induce the king of Jorjan to deliver him up. He rewarded him, on the contrary, with riches and honours; and protected him, as long as he chuſed to continue at his court, againſt the all-powerful reſentment of that formidable monarch.

* Amongſt many inſtances of Tamerlane's attention to the encouragement of literature, he preſented Firuzbadi, author of an Arabic Dictionary, with 5000 pieces of gold, as a reward for his induſtry and learning. See Dict. قاموس kamus.

* Many valuable works, of the compoſition of the laſt centuries, may nevertheleſs be ſcattered over the Eaſt; which ingenious and learned travellers may in time diſcover.

P. viii. * Mahmoud, Sultan of Ghezna, invaded Hindoſtan twelve times: the firſt was in the year 1000. The Ghaurid, dy-aſty commenced in 1157; and gave way to the Patani about the beginning of the thirteenth century. Baber, the great grandſon of Tamerlane, after four invaſions, defeated Ibrahim Lodi, the laſt emperor of this race, and mounted the throne in the year 1525. The preſent Great Mogul is his lineal deſcendant.—With regard to the prevalence of the Arabic and Perſian in the Hindoſtan or Moors, any perſon converſant with thoſe languages may be convinced, by running his eye over the vocabularies of the vulgar dialect, which have been publiſhed by Meſſis. Hadley and Ferguſon. In the Nagree and Bengal, nothing has indeed hitherto appeared; my opinion, in reſpect to them, is founded, therefore, upon the number of words which I have occaſionally heard mentioned, as belonging to theſe idioms, which were, in fact, Arabic. I ſhall confine myſelf to one ſtrong example. In the trial of the Maharajah Nuncomar for forgery, before the ſupreme court of judicature at Bengal, one of the interpreters, whoſe practical knowledge of the Perſian and Hindoſtan languages appears to be uncommonly extenſive, being aſked by the court, what word the witneſs, then examined, made uſe of to expreſs Bond; he answers, "Temaſook, which is a Perſian word; it is Khut in the Nagree language." But neither temaſook تمسك nor khut خط are of Perſian or Nagree original, being both adopted from the Arabic. [N. B. In the printed trial Immaſook is the word uſed, which is an error.] It may alſo be obſerved, that many of the witneſſes who are examined in the Moors, in the Nagree, and in the Bengal dialects, uſe a variety of Arabic words; as سكة دوات ſicca dewat A ſilver ink ſtandish; جواب سوال jawab ſawal Queſtion and answer, or converſation, (ſee Trial p. 53, 54.) with many other words which occur in different parts of the trial.—For the manner in which the Arabic and Perſian are incorporated in the Malay, See Maleiſché Spraakunſt (a Dutch Grammar of that dialect) by George Henrik Werndly. —The language of the Turks, it may be here obſerved, is called murwella مولج, which literally implies a horſe, a bull, or other animal, of different colours; their dialect being a mixture of Turkiſh, Arabic, and Perſian. This name, for the ſame reaſon, ſeems to be alſo applicable to the languages of India.—Amongſt other Arabic and Perſian words, which I find technically uſed in the Code of Gentoo Laws, are (p. 41, 44, 53, &c.) ایام شادی ayami ſhadee Days of marriage. ایام is the plural of the Arabic يوم yum A day; and شادی shadi is a Perſian word ſignifying Gladneſs. Fakeer A religious mendicant (p. 40. &c.) is derived from the Arabic root فقر Poverty, &c. Haram A feraglio, (p. 79.) comes from the root حرم Forbidden, unlawful, &c. Vakeel (p. 105.) An agent, adminiſtrator, &c. is from the root وكى Committing to another the management of one's affairs. There are many more, as Muſnuud, reyots, Ihtimandar, Shebbi tareekie, &c. but it is unneceſſary to ſwell this note with a multitude of examples. Theſe furniſh a ſufficient ground for enquiry; which, I am perſuaded, the ingenious Mr. Halhead, to whom we are indebted for the Engliſh tranſlation of this Code, will be able fully to inveſtigate, together with many points of more importance; as we are with pleaſure informed, (pref. xxxvii.) that he had been happy enough to become acquainted with a Bramin of extenſive knowledge, who had undertaken to teach him the Shanſcrit language.

* Though I have taken the liberty of pointing out what I conceive to be miſtakes in ſome very eminent men; yet I ſhould be very uncandid, if I did not acknowledge, that I have, at the ſame time, derived from them much information; and from none more than Mr. Bryant's Mythology; D'Herbelot's Bibliothèque Orientale; and Dr. Hyde's Religio Veterum Perſarum. I have often taken the benefit of the reſearches and opinions of thoſe and other learned men: and make this general acknowledgment, where, through haſte or inadvertency, I may have omitted to mention my authorities.

The above list I have given, as the most authentic, from Sir Isaac Newton; Herodotus, Xenophon, Pausanias, Justin, and other historians, differing so remarkably, especially with regard to the names, eras, and acts of the early kings, that, if it was of the least importance to reconcile them, it would be impossible.

P. xiii. * A king. داراب (from دار the participle of داشتن to have, possess, &c. and اب water); or perhaps دارا داراب, King Darab; as Dara appears rather to have been a general epithet, like King, Sultan, &c. than the peculiar name of any individual prince. Any argument drawn thence by Sir Isaac Newton and others, therefore, that the Persian coins called Darics, current in Greece and Asia Minor, were coined by Darius the Mede, after the defeat of Cræsus; or, according to some, by Darius the son of Hyftafpes, seems by no means conclusive; either as to the date of the coinage, or even the existence of those princes: as Darics might have been struck by any Dara or king of Persia, as the Sultanines might have been coined by any or all of the Sultans of Egypt. — همای Homai signifies A bird of Paradise, &c. — روشنا Roshana, in Persian, signifies Splendor, &c. and is evidently the Roxana of the Greeks.

* M. D'Herbelot, from this event, and the word Beizet, derives the Bezant or Byzantine wedge of gold; and not from the town of Byzantium, as generally imagined. But this seems a conjecture too refined to be just. The whole of this story, as far as relates to Philip, it must be acknowledged, is to the last degree doubtful; being diametrically in opposition to the most probable and best supported period of the History of Greece. Besides, had there ever been a tribute of golden eggs imposed by the Persians on Philip or any other prince, مرغانه خایه murghané, or some word originally Persian, would have been used; and not بيضة Beizet, which being Arabic, must only have been introduced into Persian writings subsequent to the Arabian conquest. Bibliothèque Orient. p. 286 and 318.

P. xiv. * Many of the silver coins of the Ashtanian kings, commonly called Parthians, bore Greek legends. See Father Erasmus Froelich in his Elementa Numismatica, Tab. xiv. &c. also Mr. Foster on the Parthian epocha, in the Archeologia of the Society of Antiquaries, Vol. III. p. 159. N. B. Arfakas, this learned gentleman (p. 164.) interprets Glory of war; but he produces no authority; and it does not even appear to be a Persian word. The name of the founder of this dynasty is named اشك Ashek by the Asiatics.

D'Herbelot says, (p. 867.) from the authority of Maffoudi, in a book called Moroujo'l'dhadab, that those old Persian historians had been translated into Arabic by an author named Ebn Mocanna.

The celebrated Khondemir observes, in the Preface to his Universal History, "That since the age of reason and discernment, he had employed his time incessantly in the reading and research after history, collecting every thing useful and agreeable from the works of the best writers: when having been invited, by the Emir Ali Shir, to superintend a valuable library, filled particularly with historians, carefully

"collected at a great expence, he had there resolved to digest the labours of his life." This learned and magnificent prince was governor of Khorassan about the end of the fifteenth century. His noble library was deposited in the city of Herat.

P. xvi. * No people in the world are greater genealogists than the Arabians, Persians, and Tartars. One book of Arabian genealogies alone, called اللبوب allobub (i. e. the hearts, or the purity of the noblesse), exceeds 100 volumes. See Dict.

Mahmud Sebekteghin, Sultan of Ghezna, the most powerful prince of the eleventh century, was the son of a Turkish slave. Though a patron of learned men, he seems to have been an exception to the general rule; at least I have not discovered that he aimed at a superior origin, or considered the meanness of his birth as any inconveniency in the government of his empire.

* A writer called Haji Khalfa has given us a catalogue of Oriental historians, to the amount of above 1300. Even private noblemen have been ambitious of being known to posterity; and the memoirs of their houses have been carefully treasured with their archives: a practice which, there is reason to believe, is still universally continued; as we may even observe in the discussions relative to the late disputes at Madras: where frequent reference is made to various public and private records, in the possession of the great men of Hindostan; but particularly to a manuscript history of the family of the present Nabob of Arcot, compiled by order of his ancestors when only simple Tartar noblemen. See Letter from Mahommed Ali Chan, Nabob of Arcot, to the Court of Directors of the East India Company, p. 17. 20. &c.

P. xvii. * Sclerus, a Greek general, who assumed the purple during the reign of the emperor Basilus II. in the tenth century, took refuge at Baghdad, where he had many private conferences with Azaddadowla king of Persia, and Emiru'l'Omra to the Khalif Al Tay. This prince is also represented as conversing familiarly with the ambassadors of Nicephorus Phocas. And an Arabian merchant, whom he had sent to Constantinople as a private agent, appears to have been so excellent a Grecian, that he forged in that tongue, and buried, to be dug up at a proper time, a prophecy of an alliance between the emperor of Greece and his master, as king of Persia. A conversation is much celebrated, both by the Greek and Mohammedan writers, between Sultan Alp Arslan (Emiru'l'Omra to the Khalif Al Kaiem) and the emperor Diogenes Romanus, whom he defeated and took prisoner in the eleventh century. The Mohammedan prince treated his royal captive with uncommon politeness; and set him at liberty on the promise of about 700,000*l.* of ransom, an annual tribute to the Khalifat of 140,000*l.* and his daughter in marriage to the Sultan's son. As the Vizir Nezam was present at this interview between Alp Arslan and Romanus; the following account of it may be considered as more authentic than that of any historian, European or Asiatic. "After some discourse, the Sultan asked the Emperor of Greece, what he should do with him." The Emperor replied, "If you are a Butcher, kill me; if a Merchant, sell me; and, if a Prince, set me at liberty." The Sultan had compassion on him, and treated him with great kindness. "Some time after, the army beginning to march back, the Emperor said to the Sultan, I am here a prisoner; and it is certain the empire will not be long without a head; for doubtless some other will usurp the government, and you will then be put to the trouble of marching back to reduce him. "Now that all the passes and strong holds are as yet in the hands of my dependants; if you send me home, I will be one of your tributaries. The Sultan then returned him in a royal manner; and he yearly paid the stipulated tribute; and “sent besides a quantity of the fine cloths of that country as a “present.” The misfortunes and death of Romanus, it must be observed, prevented his paying the whole of his ransom;

but Alp Arslan having afterwards twice defeated the generals of Michael Ducas, who succeeded Romanus, the tribute agreed to by Romanus was continued to be paid by the Emperors of Greece for many years. See also Tarikhu'l-Moslemin or Hismenia, Media, along the coast of Sinope on the Euxine; in Crete;

in Italy, on the Adriatic, in the Gulph of Poseidonium, and structures, of which he speaks with less confidence, on the Cel-

who are expressly said, in v. 22. to be the priests till the reign of Darius the Persian.—Cyrus being never questioned, uncommon difficulties are found in making the eras coincide. Darius
the Persian, says Sir Isaac, must be Darius Nothus; for Darius Nathus we should read Darius Hystaspes; Artaxerxes Mnemon should be Artaxerxes Longimanus; and Simeon Justus should be the high priest who met Alexander, and not Jaddua. See Newton's Chron. p. 358. et seq.—By this mode of alteration and substitution, we may make any thing of any thing.

P. xx. a Eastern authors say, that Ardesbir's mother was of the tribe of Benjamin, and a descendant of Saul; also, that one of his favourite wives was of the tribe of Judah, and of the line of Solomon.

P. xxi. a The first was the father of Darius, that is, Achse-rus, Assuerus, Oxyares, Aueres, or Cy-axares, &c. Newt. Chron.
p. 368.—Xerxes, Achsebirosch, Achseverus, or Oxyares, succeeded his father Darius, &c. See p. 353.—Josephus, the Septuagint, and Dr. Hyde, are apparently right with regard to the prince who married Esther; yet notwithstanding Dr. Hyde's opinion, (Relig. Vet. Perf. p. 43.) it is not from the names that any analogy can be discovered. The king, in the Persian historians, supposed to correspond with Artaxerxes Longimanus, is Ardesbir Dirazdest, or Bahaman, so often mentioned; but excepting the initials, there is not a corresponding letter in the words; nor any circumstance in sound or sense that can justify such corruption. Ardesbir, as before observed, (p. xix.) was a great friend to the Jews: his favourite wife, according the Persians, was of that nation; his era and marriage will agree therefore perfectly well with the Ahasuerus of Scripture; who must, however, as well as the Jewish captivity, if this conjecture is found to be rational, be brought down about a century lower than the present chronology.

Many words in Persian are written either with or without the initial Elif or A; اسکندر Eskender or سکندر Sekender Alexander. افریدون Afridoun or فریدون Feridoun. افشاندن af-shanden or فشاندن fushanden To scatter. اگر eger or گر ger
If. ابر aber or بر ber Upon. اشکل ashkel or شکل shekel A fetter
a shackle. اشکم ashkem or شکم shekem The belly, &c.
If Chofru is written with an initial A, it forms Akhofru. In Hebrew Ahasuerus is אחשורוש, which, by the difference of pointing (a mere arbitrary modern innovation, and not in use till many centuries after those Sacred Books were written) may be pronounced Ahasuerus, Achasuerus, Achasurus, Achasurus,

&c. as, es, os, us, or s, being only Western terminations added to Eastern names; as Darius from Dara, Saporis from Shaper, Hormisdas from Hormozd, &c. The difference therefore between Chofru and Ahasuerus appears so simple, and so much in conformity with the idiom of the language, that it may rather be called a provincial variation than a corruption; there being many words in Scripture, which undeniably mean the same place, written with a much greater disagreement: the sacred writers, in matters of such trifling import as proper names, appearing always to have followed the general rule, of spelling such words after the manner in which the Jews then pronounced them.—The following is given as one example: Ararat, the mountain where the ark rested after the flood, is called,
by Jeremiah, Ararat Minni; by Amos, Harmunab; the Chaldee paraphrast makes it Armini; the Samaritan, Hararat; the Vulgate, Armon; and the Septuagint, Remmon. In other places it is written Monab, Mona, Mini, Miniyas, &c.

See Ezra, Chap. iv. 5. 6.

P. xxii. a Many circumstances in our own times, it may be here observed, create no wonder, because they are familiar;
but a little attention to them will often save us much trouble.
What different shapes does not the same Christian name assume in the different nations of Europe? and if we allow such liberties to the ancients, which unquestionably they took, we shall be no more surprised at finding the same word differently pronounced by a Hebrew, a Persian, a Syrian, or a Greek; than by an Englishman, a Frenchman, a Spaniard, or an Italian. Could any thing but positive information induce an Asiatic to believe that the following were the same names: John, Joannes, Jean, Juan (pronounced also Huan), Ivan, and Giovanni—James,
Jacobus, Jaques, Jago, and Giacomo—Joseph and Giuseppe—
George and Jorje (pronounced also Horbe)—William, Guillielmus, Guillaume, and Guillermo—Walter, Gualterus, Gautier, &c.

See this Dissertation, p. v. vii. and their notes.

There are many names in Esther, Ezra, and Nehemiah, which are undoubtedly Persian; and others which are probably so, though under Chaldaic and Hebrew disguise; as Esther from استر ester or ستارا sitara A star; مهمان mehman A stranger or guest; میبشاک mishakh A vine branch; میزار melzar A vineyard. وشتی vashiti A beautiful or excellent woman. — گنجی ginzi or ganzi (Esth. c. iii. 9.) seems to be the Persian گنجی gunji or gingi A treasury; and here the learned Bochart (Phaleg. p. 69.) seems to have made a mistake: for he says “Persae “hodie dicunt گنجی ceniz;” but گنجی keniz or ceniz, in Persian, signifies A girl; and the word denoting A treasury, as above observed, is exactly the same with that in the Bible: the difference of vowels being of no consequence; and nothing being more common in the East, even to this hour, than pronouncing many words written with ج j, as if spelt with x; as فوجدار
foujdar or fouzdar; گجرات Gujerat or Guzerat; جنکیز خان Jengiz Khan or Zengiz Khan.—Indeed almost every observation which this learned man has made, with regard to the Persian, evidently shews that he did not understand it; and there are even some circumstances which render his knowledge of the Arabic questionable. “Nehemiah ii. 8. פָּרְדָּס (pardus) para-“disus creditur esse Persicum.” فردوس fardus is however an Arabic word, as well as Hebrew: it is likewise found in the Greek παραδυσος; but it is foreign to the Persian.—N. B. The Arabians having no پ p, use ب b or ف f instead of it.—Bochart's conjectures, with regard to Pasergada, (which, without necessity, he transposes to Parasgada, and translates Persian army)
Chorsakas, Shatranj, &c. p. 69 and 253 are also obviously wrong.

See New System of Ancient Mythology, by Mr. Bryant, Vol. I. p. 226. “I am entirely a stranger to the Persian and “Arabic languages.” See Vol. III. p. 34. “In our progress
“to obtain this knowledge, we must have recourse to the writers “of Greece. It is in vain to talk about the Arabian or Persic “literature of modern date;” &c.

See Preface to Vol. I.

P. xxiii. a Mr. Bryant says, Vol. III. p. 582. “It is “said, that in the Shaster of this people (Gentoos) a like his“tory is given of the earth being overwhelmed by a deluge, in

"which mankind perished." How shall we reconcile this with the following extract from the Preface to the Code of Gentoo laws, (p. xxxix.) "For then we at once come to the immediate era of the Flood, which calamity is never once mentioned in those Shasters; and which yet we must think infinitely too remarkable to have been even but slightly spoken of, much less to have been totally omitted, had it even been known in that part of the world. The Bramins indeed remove this objection by two assertions: one, that all their Scriptures were written before the time by us allotted to Noah; the other, that the Deluge really never took place in Hindostan."—See also Observations on the Apamean Medal, by the Hon. El implies likewise, A race, family, &c. in which sense, as a prefix or an adjunct to the name of the founder, it may denote any people descended from one common ancestor; but without marking any particular mode of worship: and we find it accordingly used often by historians, to distinguish the families of Eastern princes; as Al Othman The house of Othman, Al Seljuk The Suljukian dynasty, Al Jengiz The family of Jengiz. — See Dictionary ال — as the Persians generally add, in pronunciation, a short i to the noun which governs the genitive, they may be also written in our characters, Ali Osman, &c. N. B. Othman is the Arabian, and Osman the Persian pronunciation of عثمان See also Dict. الله

^b Aon, in Arabick, it may be observed, signifies assistance, defender, &c. Elaon might denote, therefore, The defender; Ab-el-aon, The Father Defender; which, whatever may have been the true origin, seems a more simple and unforced etymology, at least, than the interpretations of Summus Sol, and Pater Deus Sol, for which no solid bottom can apparently be discovered. ^c Hamé, Mr Bryant says, Vol. I. p. 3. on the information of Gale's Court of the Gentiles, signifies the Sun in Persic. The authority is suspicious: I have been able to discover nothing similar to it in that language; and must with-hold my belief. Ham or hamé, signifies in Arabic, inter alia, A prince or chief of a family; and in that sense may explain the origin of many names: whilst hammé, implying A warm bath or spring, might naturally give appellations to hot bituminous fountains, without forcing their etymological origin to the Sun, or to the patriarch Ham.

P. xxvii. ^a Mythology, Vol. I. p. 62. and 225. and 226. Vol. II. p. 461. Hestia must be from a different root: In Persian هستی hesti signifies A being, substance, existence, essence; and in this sense may have perhaps been used as the name, title, or attribute of a divinity.

Istakhar ought properly to be spelt استخر, but by the Arabians it is in general written اصطخر; whence Dr. Hyde has conceived the derivation to have been from صخر rocks. See Dict. خور and خَر, ایستادن, استادن, ایستادن.

It may be observed, as a general rule, that the Persians, Arabians, and Indians, writing without the short vowels, and seldom in their manuscripts affixing the vowel points, it is impossible to reduce them to any fixed standard: the pronunciation of different kingdoms or districts being, in many respects, distinct from one another. Where a word is spelt therefore in our characters asta, esta, ista, ofa, or ufa, it makes, in general, no alteration in the sense. Eastern nations have indeed not only a variation in pronouncing; but much of the apparent discrepancy has arisen from the different powers, which the different nations and individuals of Europe have given to those vowels; and the arbitrary modes which translators and travellers have laid down for expressing Oriental words in the characters of Europe: there being hardly, for example, two gentlemen from India, who, although sounding the words precisely in the same manner, will not, when expressing those sounds upon paper, differ remarkably in the compass of a very few lines.—See Arabic Grammar, p. 5. and Preface to Specimen of Persian Poetry, p. xiii.

It may be objected to those etymologies, perhaps, that the word is most commonly written اصطخر: but, whilst the authority of the author of the Farhang Jehangiri, who spells it in the true Persian manner استخر, appears to be unquestionable on this ground; when we consider, at the same time, that the character now in use amongst those Oriental nations, had no existence (as observed above, p. iv.) till the tenth century of our era; and that Istachar was founded perhaps 2000 years before that period; those particular letters, which the Arabians have since chosen to express that name, can have no more weight in a discussion of this nature, than advancing the French manner of writing Londres, as an argument that London was an error.

See Mythology, Vol. I. p. 65 and 66. Vol. III. Pref. xxviii.

Hebrew שמש Shemesh The Sun. Arabic شمس Shams Syria; with the article, الشام or الشامة

D'Herbelot says, p. 772. that some Eastern geographers derive the name Sham from a wart; because the country is studded over with a number of small hillocks, resembling those excrescences on the human face. Black moles on the face have ever been considered in the East as extremely beautiful: and circumstances full as whimsical have often given names to places.—See also Dictionary سوري

See Mythology, Vol. I. p. 6. and 94.—The Oriental adjunct is ستان stan or ایستان istan, the participle of استادن, ایستادن or ایستادن To stand, reside, dwell, place, fix, &c. whence مغلستان or مغلستان Mogul-istan (part of Tartary). هندوستان or هندوستان Hindo-istan (India). فارسستان Fars-istan (Persia). خوزستان Chuz-istan (Sufiana). This last country Mr. Bryant, as well as Bochart, supposes to have been so named from Chus; but z and s, as before observed, being distinct radicals, and never confounded but by error or vulgarism, it has a very suspicious bottom: whilst خوز in Persian signifies a nation; and is particularly applied to denote the inhabitants of this very district.

P. xxviii. ^a ^b Aur (Vol. I. p. 13.) seems to be the Arabic ار ar, irr; اري ari, ira; اور awar (plur. اور aur or awar)

Heb. אור aur, which denote, amongst other significations, Fire, a fire-place, kindling a fire, heat (of the Sun, of fire, of thirst, &c.) — Ab (Myth. Vol. I. p. 2.) is אב in Heb. and أب in Arab. Father — Ad (p. 23.) Mr. Bryant conceives to be A chief, king, lord; and supposes, when doubled, that adad should imply something superlative, as A king of kings; but superlatives are not so formed in the Eastern dialects; and ad is perfectly synonymous with adad; both, in Arabic, implying Victory, strength, superior power, &c. neither is ada the feminine of ad, اذا or ادي being a different root, signifying affixing; also, increasing in strength, &c. None of those words, at the same time, appear to signify one, according to Macrobius; nor first, agreeable to Mr. Bryant's conjecture. عد Ad and عداد adad, from another root, denote Number in general: and عدو adu (pl. اعداء ada) signifies an enemy: in all which senses we can see sufficient presumption for the formation of proper names: and for their being figuratively applied to chiefs or conquerors, to friends as well as foes. — Our learned author next objects (p. 25.) to the derivation of Adam, adama, adamana, and other similar names, &c. from the Hebrew אדם, or the Arabic آدم, wishing to support the Cushites, by tracing such places to Ad-ham, which he translates Lord Ham: but, whilst Ad does not appear to signify a Lord; whilst the veneration paid to Ham is by no means proved; and whilst the texture of the Oriental languages, as above observed, (p. xxv.) will not allow the dropping of the medial b, we can see no ground for departing from the above roots; which not only denote the Father of mankind, but man in general, a chief, concord, society, &c. which are, unquestionably, etymological grounds of superior strength to that which he proposes. — Seman, he says, (p. 38.) signifies Cælestis Sol; but it appears to be simply the Arabic سما fema, or the Persian سمان feman or اسمان afuman Heaven, without any particular reference to the Sun. Di or Dio a deity (p. 38.) appears to have some analogy to the Persian دیو pronounced dio, diu, dew, or div, which implies a supernatural being, a demon, a genius, &c. — Kur (p. 39.) appears to be the Persian خر or خور Khur The Sun. — Cohen or Kahen, he says, (p. 40.) appear to have been pronounced Cahen and Chan, and to have signified a Priest, and also a Lord or Prince. — کهن kubun in Persian and کاهن kaben Arab. (pl. كهنة kehené or kehenet and كهان kehan) signify a priest, soothsayer, augur, &c. But the word which denotes a prince is from a different root, being written خان Khan, the name by which the emperors of Tartary and other Eastern princes have been generally known. As for Konab, the title of Moses, it differs from both, being the Hebrew כהן — Bel, Bal, Baal (p. 45.) ; بل in Arabic signifies a lord, a master, &c. which appears to be the true meaning of this Babylonish idol's name; and no proof is brought of its being in any shape the particular representative of the Sun. — Keren or kern (p. 46.) signifies, in Arabic, a horn; قرن keren denotes also junction in general, and قران keran A happy conjunction of the planets: it is also an epithet synonymous to Felix or Augustus: hence صاحب قران sabeb keran has been a royal title adopted by many Oriental princes, especially by Tamerlane and by Shah Jehan the Great Mogul, (See Dict. p. 1033.) — ذوالقرنین Zulkernin was also a title given to the two Alexanders, or Cai-cobad and Alexander the Great, (See Dict. سکندر). Craneus or Carneus, which Mr. Bryant mentions as titles of the Sun, may possibly be merely the Greek termination added to کران keran or geran, کرانه kerané or gerané, which, in Persian, mean great, grand, exalted, excellent; epithets naturally applicable by the Persians to that splendid body which was so long the chief ostensible object of their worship. — Oph A serpent, (p. 49.) may perhaps be analogous to the Arabic افعى efa or افاى efa A viper; whilst اوب aub signifies in Persian A large serpent or the Python; and Abadir, which he interprets the serpent deity, may possibly be the Persian اوبادر aubadir signifying a serpentine. — Ain A fountain, (p. 51.) is the Arabic عين —

Under this article, a note occurs (p. 56.) relative to Damascus, which is a further proof how much a resemblance of sounds may mislead where there is no radical knowledge. He says, Damascus is the city of the prince; but whilst it is impossible to make a city of Dam or Ad-ham, شيخ Sheikh A prince, &c. is a root widely differing from the terminating syllable of دمشق Demshuk, the common way of writing Damascus (See Dict.) — Phi or fi (p. 89.) في Phi in Arabic signifies the mouth: it is the genitive of فو fu or فوه Phuh; but it is also used in the nominative: whence في عين Phi-aini or Phiainin may imply, The mouth of a fountain. I should much doubt, however, if Pharaoh can have any relation to this particle. فراعون Phiraon in Arabic signifies A crocodile; and the people of Egypt are called by them فراعون قومي Phiraon Koumi The people of the crocodile. It signifies also, metaphorically, a tyrant; but whether this meaning took its origin from the voraciousness of the animal, or the animal was so named from the brutality of the prince, it may be difficult to determine. Some learned men, it may be observed, however, have doubted whether this word was ever adopted by the Egyptian kings, or applied by their subjects; considering it merely as a name of contempt, bestowed upon them by neighbouring nations. Phialé seems to be the Persian پياله pialé, (it being common with the Arabians and other nations to change the Persian p into ph, as فارس Perfia; فيل for فيل An elephant, &c. Pialé signifies a phial, a cup, and also a large vessel; and hence may imply any subterraneous basin into which a river might discharge itself. — Ai, and aia (p. 90.) may perhaps be the Arabic اي aya اوي awa, which denotes a mansion, dwelling, place of rest, settlement or residence; and, in that sense, may apply to the combination of Agypt, the dwelling of the Copts or Egyptians. With regard to Athenai, Thebai, &c. I should hardly suppose, that these had any connection with the East; being mere Greek inflections. In which light I should likewise view Rom-a, Etn-a (which he interprets the country of Rom, of Etn, &c.); as I think it rather refining too much upon derivation to search for occult Asiatic meanings for mere Grecian and Roman terminations; which are so perfectly consonant to the texture of the Greek and Latin tongues. As to India, which upon this etymology he would translate The Country of Ind, it certainly was never known in that quarter of the world; the original word being هند hind An Indian, or the Indian nation; هندی hindi, or هندو hindou Indian, belonging to India, &c. هندوستان Hindostan The country of the Indians. — Macar, which (p. 67.) he says is a sacred Amonian title, and gives names in consequence to many places, appears to be simply the Arabic مقار Macarr, which denotes a place of residence, a habitation, &c. Macarron is the same word, either in the plural, or pronounced with the nunnation. (In reading the Alcoran and other books in the solemn style, on is often the termination of the nominative case, in of the genitive or dative, and an of the accusative; which, in common reading or conversation, is generally dropt: this is what Arabic grammarians call nunnation, See Arab. Gramm. p. 33, &c.) The ancient Gedrosia is now named Mocran. — Melech, (p. 70.) is Hebrew and Arabic for a king, and also an angel; as מלך and ملك melek or ملك malek; and ملکه meleké or meleket A queen. — Anak (p. 72.) seems to be analogous to the Arabic عنت Of عنت anak or unk, which denote Princes, chiefs, tall men, &c. — Sar or zar (p. 73.) سر ser or far, in Persian, signifies The head, summit, chief, principal, &c. and is one of the most common compounds in the language; as سردار sardar A general, or chief; سرخيل serkheil The commander of a troop; سراجور serakhur The master of the horse, &c. Placed after nouns, سار denotes Magnitude, multitude, and similitude; as کوهسار kushsar A large mountain or mountainous country; برگسار berksar Full of leaves; شاه سار shahsar Royal, like a king. سارا

sara means pure, excellent, &c. سرا sara is A palace; زار zar is an adjunct expressive of place, especially where there is a great quantity of any thing, as زار لاله laleh zar A bed of tulips; گلزار gulzar A rose-garden. زر zer signifies gold; زرسان zarsan Golden. A variety of other meanings may be given of those words; which, in their natural, unforced senses, will denote Dignity, quality, or situation, without having recourse to the figurative signification of a rock, which is doubtful and unconvincing. It may also be observed in general, that all Persian nouns (with very few exceptions) when applied to any thing having life, form their plurals in an; so that combinations of titles, such as far-an, far-on, &c. are easily deducible from the same roots, without any compound, or adjunct.

—Air (p. 92.) ایر air, in Arabic, denotes the North and the East; also a scorching wind; it signifies likewise a hard stone, cotton, &c. From another root, عير air means a caravan, a chief, a prince, &c. آرا Ara implies honey, sweet dew, manna, (and, as well as ar, ir, or) fire, heat, &c. Ara in Persian expresses Adorning, beautifying, ornament, &c. all which senses may easily be supposed to have entered into the composition of many names of places; as the accident of situation, elegance of buildings, the produce of the soil, or a respect for their chiefs, might suggest. The same idea may be likewise adopted with regard to کبر kir, کار kar, کور kur, &c. which in Arabic signify Bitumen, pitch, camels, &c. Kar, kur, Karat, kirat, &c. A hill, a large stone, a tract of stony country, cotton, &c. کار Kar in Persian denotes Art, commerce, &c. whence we may easily suppose, The country of bitumen, cotton, or camels, The castle on the hill, The city of commerce, The rocky region, &c. &c.—کال cal, calah, &c. (p. 93.) may be different modes of pronouncing the Arabic قلعة kala or kalat (pl. قلاع kyla) which imply Castles, towers, &c. especially on the tops of mountains or high grounds. — قله Plur. قلال Arab. is A hill. — جب Gib (p. 94.) in Arabic denotes a mountainous country, which is also expressed by جبل Gibl; whence comes Gibraltar. — تار Tar, in Persian, is the summit or ridge of a mountain, &c. and andر Tur, in Arabic, is generally used to express Mount Sinai.—کاف, &c. (p. 95.) which is interpreted A rock, promontory, &c. has every appearance of being that fabulous mountain کاف Kaf, (see Dictionary) which the Arabians, Persians, and other eastern nations have supposed, beyond all tradition, and long after Mohammed, to surround the world. It became therefore the subject of much fable, and of perpetual allusion; every hill or promontory, which their writers meant to distinguish, (like Alps or Alpine with us) being called Kaf or Kaph. Caph-el, Caph-ar, and Caph-arez, may therefore be interpreted The Mount of God, the Vulcano or mountain of fire; the Hill of the world, &c. ارض arez, amongst many significations, denoting the world; without having seemingly any reference to the Sun; which, in a variety of places, Mr. Bryant lays down as an undisputed fact, but without supporting it by the least satisfactory authority. — Beth is the Hebrew בית, the Arabic being بیت beit: they both signify a house, temple, &c. آباد Abad is Persian, and implies a place of residence. گاو or کاو Gau or kaw (p. 98.) in Persian, means a hollow, low ground, or any excavation; whence it might be applied to a house in a bottom, a cavern, or any thing similar; it also denotes magnificent, venerable, great, strong, warlike, powerful. Gaw signifies likewise The Sun, with a variety of other meanings, see Dictionary. — Thaman, which (Vol. III. p. 10.) he says signified eight, in the ancient language of the country round Mount Ararat, where the ark is supposed to have rested, is merely the Arabic ثمان thaman; and ceman or feman seems to be only that variation of sound, given by the Persians and other nations to the initial Arabic t'h, which they cannot pronounce: this renders it quite unnecessary, therefore, to alter Cemainum or Shemainum, as he proposes in the following page. There appears likewise a mistaken conjecture (p. 12.) relative to the city of Tabriz or Tauris (the capital of the country called Adherbijan or Azerbaijan, part of the Armenia and Media of the Greeks), which, he says, is named likewise Albors or Albarit. This he imagines to be a contraction of Tabaris or Tavaris; but the first is apparently Arabic, the other Persian: برص and برص bors in Arabic have a great variety of meanings; the last, inter alia, signifying leprous; and, with the Arabic article prefixed, البرص implies The moon, from the spotted appearance of her disk. تبریز or تابریز Tabriz is the name by which this place is generally known; and is conjectured to have been given on account of that healthiness of situation, for which it has been much remarked; the first word implying dispersing a fever, or resisting an infection: tho' it is not impossible, as this country was anciently famous for the adoration of fire, that the name should have an allusion to that circumstance; for تابریز may be interpreted Scattering heat, diffusing splendor, &c. البرص albors kuh (The mountain Albors) is celebrated by Firdousi: and it is mentioned, by Ali Yezdi, l. 3. c. 57. of his life of Tamerlane; but that is evidently Caucasus, and not the place here referred to.

The difficulty, if unacquainted with the languages, of discovering the analogy of Eastern words by the eye or the ear, will evidently appear from a few examples. ارز (Arz, arez, &c.) in Arabic, signifies A pine, or any cone-bearing tree; a chief, robust; cold; &c.: (in Persian) Price, value, quantity esteem, honour. ارض (arz, arez, or ardeh Arab.) signifies the Earth; عرض (arz, &c.) A present; an accident; desire; plunder; an army; merchandize, &c. — عرس (aris) Astonished; a spouse; wedlock. عرس (aris) Cheerful. — ارش (arish) A quarrel, a mulct for manslaughter. عرش (arish) A throne. — بتل (betel) Cutting, separating. — بطل (betel) A champion; heroic; with numbers of others which might be easily adduced—Whilst مصطفى (Mustafa) Excellent, selected, is derived from the root صفي (sefi) of the same signification. — محمد (Muhammed) Deserving great praise; احمد (Ahmed) More praise - worthy. ممدوح (Mumdedeh) or ممدوح (Memduh) Praised, celebrated; and ممدوحات (Memduhat) Celebrated things, are all brought from حمد hemd Praise. — انصار (ansar) Defenders (i.e. The citizens of Medina, who supported Mahomet). المنصور (Almansor) Affisted, defended, celebrated for victories, august. مستنصر (Mofsanfer) Imploring or receiving assistance (names of two Khalifs) come from the radical نصر (nefr) Victory, defence, assistance.

Since writing the above, I have seen a Review of Mr. Bryant's Mythology, printed at Amsterdam: in which the authors appear to have greatly mistaken that learned gentleman's system; and to have expressed themselves, at the same time, with an indecent petulance, which, for the honour of learning, it were to be wished might never accompany a difference of opinion. If they will turn to his Preface, to volume I. of the Mythology, p. xiv. they will read "The mistakes of the Greeks in respect to ancient terms, which they strangely perverted, will be exhibited in many instances: and much true history will be ascertained from a detection of this peculiar misapplication." Many other passages clearly explain his plan: and one of his chief objects is thence to develop ancient mythology from the obscurity in which the Greeks had involved it, by corrupting the channels of derivation. He endeavours to penetrate therefore to the fountain head of language, of which he considers the Greek to be only a remote stream. His ideas, on this ground, are judicious; and he wanted only a knowledge of Eastern learning, to have made many curious and interesting discoveries. With what propriety then can those gentlemen triumph, and question Mr. Bryant's knowledge of the Greek, when he professedly goes to a higher origin for his Etymologies? Where is the justice of the following among many similar criticisms, "Αφ' ου Απολλο falso fit ex Αφρα, ignis, et tor turris; cum secundum certissimas linguæ rationes ab Αφρα oriatur? Where is the decency of "Cum ubique in Bryantio temeritatis novitatem miraremur, exco-gitare tamen non potuimus quis eum stupor tenuerit, cum hæc scriberet?" (p. 68.)

A feudatory chief or military tenant is called سپاهی — In Arabic اخذة akhezat and قطیعة ketiat are generally understood as fiefs: the first implying The receiving of lands from a chief; and the other expressing The cutting off a certain district from a greater, and giving it to a subject on certain conditions. As these words may however refer also to copyholds or farms, nothing conclusive can be drawn from them alone. زعمامة Ziyamet in Arabic denotes also A fief bestowed for military services; and زعيم zaym from the same root A feudal chief, or military tenant. نفیر عام nefiri amm implies A general summons of nobles to take the field with their military vassals.

* The number nine has been long in great veneration among the Tartars. All presents made to their princes consists, in general, of nine of each article. At all their feasts this number and its combinations are always attended to in their dishes of meat, and in their skins of wine or other liquors. At one entertainment, mentioned by the Tartar king Abulgazi Khan, there were 9000 sheep, 900 horses and 99 vessels of brandy, &c. Even the roving Tartars rob the caravans by this rule; and will rather take nine of any thing than a greater number. Abulgazi Khan, in the preface to his history, says, "I have divided it into nine parts, to conform myself to the custom of other writers, who all have this number in particular esteem." It appears to have been likewise a favourite mysterious number amongst the Goths. We are told, that every nine years there was a solemn festival, when nine animals of every species were sacrificed to their gods. Oden, they say, resolving to die as a warrior before the approach of age and infirmity, called a general assembly of the Goths, and wounded himself in nine mortal places. See Adam of Bremen in Grotii Prolegomenis, p. 104. Mallet, Introduction à l'Histoire de Dannemarc.

P. xxxv. * The resemblance of the Tartar and European diets seems indeed to have struck Voltaire. "Il paraît que les Kans Tartares étaient en usage d'assembler des Diètes vers le Printemps; ces Diètes s'appelaient Courilté. Eh! qui fait si ces assemblées et nos Cours Plénieres, au mois de Mars et de Mai, n'ont pas une origine commune? Essai sur l'Histoire Generale, ch. xlviii."—Abul Pharaje, p. 466. calls this Great Council قریلتای Kuriltai or قریلتای Kariltai. — هارس Hares signifies, a Guardian, governor, or protector; but on his fall his name was changed to ابا Iba The refractory; ابلیس Eblis The desperate; and شیطان Sheitan The proud. Many of the ideas relative to Kaf are even adopted in the Alcoran: they were the general belief in the days of Mohammed; and it was not till geography became better understood, in the East, that they discovered the several divisions of Kaf to be Caucasus, Imaus, Atlas, and other mountains in Asia and Africa.—The Peris are, by some writers supposed to be all females, and the Dives males; but without having any communication; each having the separate power of continuing their species: yet, in the Tahmuras namé, we find the brothers of the Peri Merjan; and the Caherman namé mentions often the kings of Shadukam.

P. xxxvii. * The most famous talismans, which rendered them proof against the arms and magic of the Dives, were the مهر سلیمان mohur Solimani, or The Seal of Soliman Jared, the fifth monarch of the world; which gave to its possessor the command of elements, demons, and of every created thing. The سپهر Siper, or Buckler of Jan ben Jan, more famous in the East than the Shield of Achilles among the Greeks. The جبهه Jebbeh or the Impenetrable Cuirass; and the تیغ آتش tigh atish, or the Flaming sword. Among the dreadful creatures of the imagination, which winged the heroes of Persia from region to region, were the Rakshé, whose ordinary food was serpents and dragons. He had long rendered the Dry Island inaccessible, till subdued by Housheng, king of Persia, or by his father Siamek Shah, who tamed, and mounted him in all their wars with the Dives. The Soham had the head of a horse with four eyes, and the body of a flame-coloured dragon: he was conquered by a famous Persian warrior called Sam Neriman. The Ouranabad is described as a fierce-flying hydra. The Ejder, ezshder or ezshdeha, are dragons of different kinds. The Syl appears to be the Basilisk, having a face somewhat human, the sight of which makes every creature to fly; the near approach being certain death. See Dictionary صبحام sobam, اوراناباد ouranabad, رشه rakshé, اجدر ejder, ازدر ezshder, ازدرها ezshdeha, syl.

The present made by the Simurgh of her feathers to Tahmuras, according to Eastern writers, gave rise to the fashion of plumed helmets. — This prince was surnamed Beniavend, Armed at all points; and Divebend, Chainer of Dives. Merjan signifies A pearl.

See Shah namé خوان ششم و کشتن رستم ارتزك ديو Khan sheshum, wa keshthen Rostam Arzshenk Dive, The sixth adventure, and the slaughter of the Dive Arzshenk by Rostam. In the next is his combat with the سپید ديو Dive sepid (white Dive). Ferdusi, who may be called the Homer of Persia, employed thirty years in the composition of this work. He died at an advanced age, in the year 1018. See also Gazophylacium Ling. Pers. p. 127.

^{b c} See Dissertations prefixed to the Rev. Mr. Warton's History of English Poetry; and Observations on the Faery Queen, p. 63.—In the Persian Romances, we find nations with the heads fish, dragons, &c. as سرزدها ser mahi ser ezshdeha. We have also the نیم سر nim ser The half heads, and دوال پای duwal pai The leather strap legs. But one of the most singular creatures is the نیم جزه nim juzé or نیم چهر nim chehr; which is supposed to be a human figure split in two; the male being the right half, and the female the left: they have, of consequence, half a face, one eye, one arm, and one foot, on which they run with incredible swiftness; and are imagined to be very dangerous and cruel. — تنین tennin, ثعبان faban, and other Arabic words used to denote Dragons, are only, radically, Large Serpents. عتقا Anka signifies An eagle, length of neck, &c. from the root عتق ank, A neck. عفريت Afrit A cruel or dangerous man, from the root عفر yfr; hence A giant, genie, demon, &c. — غول Ghul Any thing terrifying, which suddenly deprives people of their senses. جن Jenn A demon, a spirit. This root signifies, inter alia, Covering, concealed, interior, dark. See جنون and جان

P. xxxviii. ^{a b} Father Angelo observes, that Magic is an art publicly taught by the Persians and Arabians. He knew a rich enchanter of Bassora, a man much respected; whose scholars were so numerous, that they possessed one entire quarter of the city. At the sound of a certain drum, accompanied by a kind of chaunt, they became, like demoniacs, suddenly inspired with a real or affected phrenzy; during which they devoured fire publicly in the streets. This is a trick not uncommon with European jugglers. These magicians, by way of distinction, wore their hair very long. See Gazophylacium Linguae Persarum, p. 155. Angelo went missionary to the East in 1663. See also Hyde's Religio Veterum Persarum, cap. 18 and 19.

^c The words expressive of Talismans, Amulets, Fascination, and Spells, are very numerous both in Persian and Arabic. I shall mention a few. نشرة nushret An amulet for preventing or curing insanity, or other malady. قبله kebié A philtre by which necromancers pretend to reconcile enemies. غرغوا ghezshghaw or غجغوا ghejghaw Tufts made of the hair of sea-cows, and hung round the necks of horses, to defend them from fascination. شبارك shebarik A tree of which they make amulets for the same purpose. عزيمة azimet An amulet, incantation, or spell against serpents, disease, or other evil. سلوانة sulwanet Shells, rings, or beads used as amulets. سلوان sulwan denotes, Water poured from a kind of shell, or upon earth taken from the grave of a dead man, which they drink to the health of a person; as a cure for love, or any severe affliction. عطنة atfet Small beads hung by women round their necks, as a charm to gain the affections of their lovers. عقرة akret A spherical amulet, worn by some women round their waists, to prevent pregnancy; and by others to favour a conception, اخذة akhzet An amulet in form of a knot, which women wear to keep their husbands faithful. نيرنك nirenk, نيرك nirek, همایل bemail, تعویذ tawiz, معقاد mikad, متمم mutemumim, غز gezz, خرز kherex, كحال kehal, وجبهة wejibet, رغب rab, قرزحلة kyrzhlet, معوذ mawiz, signify amulets made of shells, beads, tufts of wool or hair, dead mens bones, &c. نجو neju, nezret, &c. imply Fascination or malignant eyes. خرجاره khercharé is An ass's head placed upon a pole in a garden, &c. to guard it against fascination.

The following account of the discovery of hidden treasure is given by the Vizir Nezam.—A prince, named Emir Ismael, having defeated another chief, called Amrou Leis, who was supposed to be very rich, search was made for his treasure; but in vain. One of the Emir's female slaves accidentally undressing to bathe on the terrafs of the palace, having laid down her girdle, set with large rubies on a white cloth; a hungry kite observing it, and supposing the red stones to be bits of meat, pounced upon the girdle and carried it off. The damsel instantly gave the alarm to the guard; and a number of horsemen were dispatched to keep the kite in view; who dropt it after a long pursuit, when it fell into a well. A man was immediately let down, who discovered in the side of it a large cavity, where a vast number of chests had been lodged, which proved to be the very treasure the Emir had been so long in quest of, to the amount of about 4,000,000l. sterling.—Burying treasure is also common among the Tartars: and sheets of gold, jewels, and rich moveables, are often interred along with the chiefs and their wives. See Abulgazi Khan's history; also Archeologia of the Society of Antiquaries, Vol. II. p. 222.

^b The ancient Persians durst not, by their religion, extinguish fire with water, but endeavoured to smother it with earth, stones, or any thing similar. This method would not soon extinguish a blazing forest.—The Parfis of Guzerat are still guided by the same hurtful superstition. See Anquetil's Zend Avesta, Vol. II. p. 567.

P. xl. ^a كوسه نشین Koufa nishin signifies, The beardless old man sitting or mounted. During the time of the Mohammedan Sultans of Persia, this ceremony was called, in Arabic, ركوب الكوسج rokubu'l'koufej The procession of Koufej, which is synonymous. — D'Herbelot observes, that a burlesque farces somewhat resembling this, was anciently customary in Italy about the middle of Lent.—September in Persia is named Mibr, the angel supposed to superintend the orb of the Sun; and the 16th day of every month is also called Mibr: in consequence of which, they imagined, that the horn of an ox (a creature sacred to the Sun) killed on that day, must be impregnated with extraordinary anti-demoniacal virtues.—M. Anquetil says, that the Parfis always carry about them papers so prepared, as a defence against the Dives, and a preservative from every distemper of body and mind. Zend Avesta, Vol. II. p. 113.

نوشته كزدم nushtei guzshdum or ركده كزدم rukai guzshdum Scorpion spells.

مرد كبران merd giran Taking or commanding men. The author of the Farhang Jhangiri makes this festival to have continued during the five last days of this month: but others confine it to the fifth. At different periods, and in different provinces, both customs might have been respectively adopted. See also Hyde's Religio Veterum Persarum, cap. 19 and 20.

^b It is not a hundred years since the conjuration of witches, demons and fairies, was commonly practised and taught in London by Lilly and others. Even men of learning and sound judgment, in other respects, were strongly impressed with a belief in those supernatural beings, and of the power of spells in commanding their service. In the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford are various formularies of invocation and incantations, collected by the very learned and sensible founder, who was strongly tinctured with those prejudices. See Ashmole's Collect. of MSS. N° 8259. 1406. 2. See also the Lives of John Lilly and Elias Ashmole, Esq. likewise Dr. Percy's Reliçts of Ancient

English Poetry, Vol. III. p. 213, 214. — Conjurers, witches, and forcerers, are accurately described in our law books. Hawkins (in his Pleas of the Crown) says, "Conjurers are those who, by force of certain magic words, endeavour to raise the devil, and oblige him to execute their commands. Witches are such who, by way of conference, bargain with an evil spirit to do what they desire of him; and Sorcerers are those who, by the use of certain superstitious words, or by the means of images, &c. are said to produce strange effects, above the ordinary course of nature." All which were anciently punished as heretics by sentence of the Ecclesiastical courts, and burnt by the writ De heretico comburendo. See Lib. 1. p. 5. By the Common Law, they could only be pilloried. 3 Inst. 44. H. P. C. 38. But by Stat. 1. James I. c. 12. these offenders are divided into two degrees: those of the first degree, with their accessories before the fact, suffering as felons without benefit of clergy. These are of four kinds; "1. Such as shall use any invocation or conjuration of any evil spirit. 2. That consult, covenant with, entertain, employ, or reward any evil spirit, to any intent. 3. As take up any dead person's body, or any part thereof, to be used in any manner of witchcraft. 4. Or that exercise any witchcraft, enchantment, charm or sorcery, whereby any person shall be killed, destroyed, consumed, or lamed in his body or any part thereof." And tho' a spirit doth not actually appear upon invocation, &c. or tho' a dead person, or part of it, be taken up to be used, and not actually used; they are still within the statute. — This law, which would disgrace the most stupid of nations in the most barbarous state of ignorance, was not repealed till the 9th Geo. II. If we keep such circumstances in view, and pay a proper attention to Chronology, when we read, we shall not, with any regard to justice, look down with contempt upon the manners and beliefs of distant times and distant countries.

P. xlii. * Some combats with the Dives have been slightly mentioned (p. xxxvi.); previous to which, great preparations were made by the heroes to arm themselves with spells, as a defence against their enchantments; accompanied with ceremonies differing little from those afterwards practised by our European knights, when setting out to engage with necromancers or giants. See Dictionary أهرمان — A duel in Arabic is called وقعة الاثنين wakeyatul'asnein The combat of two. — See Dictionary أسفنديار Asfendiār. He was son to Kishtab, the fifth king of the Kaianian dynasty, and father of Ardesbir Dirazdest, the Artaxerxes Longimanus of the Greeks. — See Shah namé for a great variety of those single combats; also the Housheng namé, Iskender namé, Tahmuras namé, and other Eastern books of Poetry and Romance. — See Khondemir; The Lah Tarikh, in the Life of Kai Khosrou; D'Herbelot Bibliothèque Orient. p. 716; and Dictionary دوازده رخ Duazdeh rokh The twelve heroes. This is a combat precisely similar to that of the Horatii and Curiatii of Rome and Alba.

البطل Albatal signifies, The knight. He was also named سيد بطل Seidi batal The lord knight. He was killed in the year of the Hejra 121. (A. D. 738.) جعفر الصادق Giaffar al Sadat, Giaffar the Just, was born at Medina, in the year 83 of the Hejra (A. D. 699.) and died in the year 148 (A. D. 764.) M. D'Herbelot seems to think that those two were the same person: but an attention to their dates, in which the Eastern writers are very particular, does not seem to justify the surmise. This learned Orientalist says, that in the French king's library there is an Arabian manuscript, called Seirat al mujabedîn (The lives of warriors); in which there is an abridgement of Albatal's life: also that there is another larger work filled with most wonderful feats of arms. Bibl. Orient. p. 193. 399.

See Ben Shunab, Khondemir, D'Herbelot, p. 371.

جريدة jeridé is a branch of a palm tree stript of the leaves. — قنا cana are canes, the hollow parts of which are filled with some solid body. Of these they generally make the Arabian spears. درية derit is a ring, at which they dart a javelin, or endeavour to carry it off on the point of a lance. — See also Historia de las Guerras Civiles de Grenada. — The Ferid Oiné, D'Herbelot says, was a common exercise among the Turkish cavaliers in the Atmeidan or Hippodrome at Constantinople. Bibl. Orient. p. 383. — The word caitiff, which in times of chivalry was often given by one knight as a term of reproach to another, has been supposed to be derived from the Italian cattivo or the Spanish cautivo, a captive, &c. It is possible, however, that it may be only a slight alteration of the Arabian word خطاف khattaf A ravisher. As one of the great ends of the institution of chivalry was to protect the sex, a violation of this important point was justly marked with every circumstance of infamy. It was chiefly applied to those giants or governors of castles, who made a practice of carrying off and imprisoning the undefended fair: and seems, in consequence, to be much more applicable to them than Captive; which carried along with it no such disgraceful idea. — I have sometimes been also induced to think, that there is some affinity between the word Knight and نخبط Nikht, which signifies those who tilt with or throw spears, in order to show strength and dexterity.

p. xliii. * See ch. 24, 25, and other passages of Ali Yezdi's History of Tamerlane, for many grand festivals given by that prince; especially on the marriages of his grandchildren in 1404. The palace which he then built, on a plain called Kanigul (the mine of flowers), was a square of 1500 cubits, chiefly of marble, encrusted on the outside of the principal apartments with porcelaine; and in the inside with ivory, ebony, gold, and precious stones. — A trifling observation which occurs in this place shows, that the contempt with which Europeans honour the Tartars and other Eastern people, is perfectly reciprocal. — "The European ambassadors were also invited to the great banquet, and partook of the diversions; for even the Kasses (a very minute animal) have their place in the ocean."

P. xliv. * Mahmoud's queen, mentioned in the text, was the daughter of the Khan of Turkestan. جميلة قندهاري Jemila Khandahiri may be interpreted the Beauty of Khandahar. Mahmoud was the Great Sultan of Ghezna, who conquered Hindostan, and many other kingdoms in the East, at the end of the tenth and beginning of the eleventh centuries. Sultan Malekshah, surnamed جلال الدولة و الدين Jelal eddoulatu eleddin (The glory of the state and of religion), of whom mention has been so often made in this Dissertation, was the third Sultan of the Seljukian dynasty; and great grandson of Seljuk, a Turcoman or Tartar nobleman, who was the founder of the family. The magnificent solemnity mentioned by the Vizir Nezam happened about the year 1076; though historians have hitherto fixed it some years earlier, on the coronation of Malekshah; but the Vizir's own account is undoubtedly superior authority. See D'Herbelot, p. 544, &c.

The Arabians and Persians, it may be here observed, have a gamut or musical scale, which they call Durri musiffel (Separate pearls); whence the old mode of teaching vocal music in Europe, by what is vulgarly called Sol-fa-ing, seems to have been borrowed; their notes being named A la mi ré; B fa pé mi; C sol fa ut, &c. See Dictionary در مفصل

P. xlvii. a "O true believer, the law of retaliation is allowed you for the slain: the free shall die for the free; and the servant for the servant; and a woman for a woman: but he whom his brother shall forgive, may be prosecuted and obliged to make satisfaction, according to what is just, and a fine shall be set on him with humanity. This is indulgence from your Lord, and mercy *. — And when the slayer shall be pardoned (in consequence of making satisfaction), he who hereafter shall transgress (by killing the slayer) shall suffer a most grievous punishment. And in this retaliation ye have life."—In another part he says, "Whoever shall take a vengeance equal to the injury which hath been done; and shall be afterwards unjustly treated, verily God will assist him." See Alcoran, chap. ii. iv. and xxii.—M. D'Herbelot, after the passage marked above with the asterisk *, inserts these words, "Mais celui qui pardonnera au meurtrier obtiendra la miséricorde de Dieu, &c." but I can discover nothing corresponding to it in this part of the Alcoran. See Bibliothèque Orientale, p. 294.

The Sonna is a collection of the sayings of Mohammed, or the traditions of his widows and companions. By the Turks and other followers of the sect of Omar, they are considered with a respect little inferior to the Alcoran; but they are rejected by the Persians and the other adherents of Ali. See Dictionary سنه sonna and دیه diyet.

The Fredum was a late introduction into the ancient European Code; being unknown in the older capitularies; and seems to have been intended by the magistrate as an additional check to private revenge. It was a sum paid by a criminal to the king, or to his feudal superior, for protection against the relations of the deceased, after they had accepted a composition. It was in general equal to a third part of this composition; but varied often, in proportion to the difficulty of protecting the person who had committed the violence. See Montesquieu de l'Esprit des Loix, liv. 30. chap. xx. Dr. Robertson's Cha. V. vol. i. p. 361.

پاداش keshas; قود karved; اباءه ibaat; بوا bawa; پاداش padash; تاوان tawan; تار tar; مقتص muktyfs; فار far. Signify The Law of Retaliation, or punishment by that law; killing one for the murder of another. اقتصاص ikfas and امثال imfal, are nearly synonymous; but more strictly denote, Eye for eye, limb for limb, &c. ظلف zelif Shedding much blood with impunity. بضر byzran myzran Blood shed unrevenged. هدر bedir Permitting blood to be shed unrevenged: this word also implies, a worthless fellow. موتور mawtur, ياتاراة yatarat One who does not revenge the death of his friend (from cowardice or other base motive). متمدي muttedi Receiving money, &c. as an expiation for murder. غوز ghur Expiating murder by a mulct. ارش ersh A fine for the shedding of blood.

The first month Muharrem, the seventh Rejeb, the eleventh Dhulkaadé, and the twelfth Dhulhadjé, were esteemed sacred in Arabia from the oldest times: and, excepting by one or two tribes, were so religiously observed, that if a man met during that time the murderer of his father, he durst not offer him any violence. The history or traditions of the old Arabs do not mention above six transgressions of this law; and these are stiled Impious wars. As three of those sacred months, however, followed close together, they used sometimes to dispense with the observation of Muharrem; keeping the next month (Sefer) sacred in its room. Mahomet adopted these observances; with an exception to the mode of transferring a month; which he declared to be a profane innovation: but he gave his followers permission to attack at all times Infidels, or those who did not pay a proper regard to the institution. See Prelim. Disc. to Sale's Alcoran, p. 196.

The Treuga Dei or Truce of God, was adopted about the year 1032, in consequence of a pretended revelation of a bishop of Aquitaine. It was published in the time of a general calamity; and it made so deep an impression on the minds of men, that a general cessation of private hostilities was observed, we are told, for seven years; and a resolution formed, that no man should, in time to come, molest his adversary from Thursday evening till Monday morning. The Pax Regis or Royal Truce was an ordinance of Lewis VIII. King of France, A. D. 1245; by which the friends or vassals of a murdered or injured person were prohibited from commencing hostilities till forty days after the commission of the offence. Dr. Robertson's Charles V. vol. i. p. 336-8.

P. xlviii. a اتو atu, برطیل bertil, رشو resh Bribing a judge or great man, to obtain any thing contrary to justice. رشوت reshwet, یاده yadé or یاذه yazé, بدکند badkund, بارé baré, ارش ersh A bribe to a judge. رایش raish A broker employed to bribe a judge. مدلی mudli Offering money to a judge, in order to corrupt him. نظاره nezaret denotes the technical language of the Arabian lawyers. هولة hawlet A sacred fire, over which witnesses used to swear.

* See the Shah namé, under the title of کدشتن سباوخس guzeshteni Siaveksh az kubi atish The passing of Siaveksh through the flaming pile. Though the whole of this anecdote may be fiction, as part of it undoubtedly is, still I must repeat, that Firdousi would not have mentioned this mode of trial, had it been unknown in Persia. — See also Code of Gentoo Laws, p. lviii, &c.

* نگارستان nigaristan The gallery of pictures: a work somewhat resembling the Gulistan; being an agreeable miscellany in prose and verse. The anecdotes in it are in general considered as founded on real history.

The subjects which fill the preceding sheets are by no means exhausted; and I had originally intended to have introduced a much greater variety of the customs, inventions, and ideas of the East: but too incessant employment has prevented the accomplishment of my design. I never was in those countries, and I may have fallen, of consequence, into errors, as well in the Dictionary as Dissertation, which a personal observation of the manners and languages of the people could alone have enabled me to avoid. The candid will correct, and perhaps pardon such mistakes. Lexicons of high authority are not free from faults; and I presume not to be more perfect. The painful difficulty of such labours might plead indeed a general apology; for, as Scaliger justly observes, Omnes paenarum facies hic labor unus habet.

PLAN of the WORK.

THE Volume now presented to the Public runs completely thro' the Arabic and Persian alphabets. The design has been, To render it simple and intelligible to the most careless Student; to be distinct in the explanation of difficulties; and to avoid whatever might, even in a remote degree, perplex a learner.

THE various significations of the words are arranged under different heads, distinguished by the small figures ¹ ² ³ &c. The synonymous meanings, especially of those words which are most generally used, are for the most part copious; which will not only determine the full meaning of the Oriental word with more precision; but may enable those who consult the Dictionary to chuse, without the trouble of recollection, that signification which may appear to be best adapted to the subject of their author. One solitary word which I have often met with, even in the most approved Dictionaries, leaves sometimes the sense so extremely doubtful, that it is impossible to understand it, without turning to another Lexicon, or having a greater knowledge in the languages than ought to be expected in a learner. How shall we discover, among many examples, what meaning Meninski annexes to parere, under أهل p. 4213? for it may signify to obey; to appear; to bring forth a child, &c. the last of which only is the sense of parere in this place.

WITHIN parenthesis will be found a variety of explanatory observations; the literal significations of idiomatical compounds; and such substantives as more clearly express that sense in which the adjectives are most generally received; as أهل القبور (the inhabitants of the tomb) The dead; عك Tough, hard (meat); &c.

CONSIDERABLE attention has been paid to the references, which, even in some Lexicons of authority, have not been attended to with sufficient accuracy; the reader being often desired to go from volume to volume, for the explanation of words, which are, after all, no where to be discovered; ex. gr. Golius p. 2512, Meninski 5443, عجفة i. q. عجفة seu pro eo; but عجفة is not to be found.—There is one particular mode of reference, wherein Golius has been copied by Meninski, which appears to be very improper. One example will illustrate it; ومشقة (Gol. p. 2740. Men. p. 5416.) is thus explained; i. q. خالي ابيض. When the meaning of a simple word is referred, in this manner, to a compound for explanation, we should naturally expect to find this compound inserted under one or other of its component terms; for they may have (as in this particular instance of خالي and ابيض) many distinct meanings; and it must be impossible for a learner to know which of those senses to chuse, in order to form the combination. I will frankly confess that I have often been perplexed by those compounds, and that I had translated this very word A white carpet; till collating my manuscript with Giggeius's Kamus, I found it there explained A white mole on the face.

THE best Arabic is spoken at Grand Cairo; the best Persian at Ispahan and Hamadan: but as almost every Mohammedan nation gives some difference of sound to many of the letters, and especially to the vowels, it is impossible to fix any uniform standard. — As this Dictionary is chiefly intended, however, for the Persian Student; and particularly for the Gentlemen in the Service of the Honourable East India Company; where I knew the precise mode of Hindostan pronunciation, I have adopted it; where I was at a loss on this ground, I have followed Meninski, Golius, Giggeius, and Castelli. One great peculiarity of the Indian pronunciation seems to consist in a broadness of sound, and especially in the frequent use of the vowels o, oo, u or ou, for a, e, or i; as کردن kurdun for kirdun; &c. For the different manner in which the Arabians and Persians pronounce the letters in general, see the Persian and Arabic Grammars; and the observations scattered thro' the preceding Dissertation. But the ear must, after all, be the great guide with regard to pronunciation. Those who go abroad must conform themselves to the mode of that country where it is their fortune to reside: to such as remain at home, the most critical accuracy of pronunciation must be of small consequence, were it even possible to be acquired. See Arab. Gram. p. 5 et seq.

I have translated the Arabic roots, as nouns, gerunds, or participles; in which senses only they are adopted by the Persians, who convert them into verbs, by means of the auxiliaries کردن kurden To do; داشتن dashten To have; بودن buden or شدن shuden To be, &c. &c. as حفظ hyfz Memory; guardianship, &c. حفظ کردن hyfz kurden To remember; to guard. صبر sebr Patience, صبر داشتن sebr dashten To have patience, &c.—In Arabic authors, however, these roots are also the third person preterite he remembered; and are even sometimes used in a present and future sense, which is only to be known from the context; and forms one of the principal difficulties of the language; (see Arab. Gram. p. 77 et seq.)—Many Arabic singular nouns, it may also be observed, are at the same time plurals to others.—Some nouns will be found both singular and plural; and some substantives as well as adjectives.—Persian infinitives are often, in construction, used substantively, see رتن—The plural feminines of Arabic adjectives, are often used as substantives in the singular; which is indeed generally the case with Arabic plurals of all kinds, when introduced into the Persian. The Arabic participles past have frequently a present signification, with a slight difference of pronunciation; as منجمد mutejemmed Congealed; mutejemmid Congealing (See also Arab. Gram. on the active and passive signification of verbs, p. 70, &c.)

SHOULD any other Arabic plurals, participles, tenses of verbs, degrees of comparison, derivatives, or other inflexions, occur to a reader, which are not to be found in this Dictionary, let him throw away the servile letters, and he will easily find them under their roots or nouns of action; ex. gr. ضرب Blows, &c. See ضرب A blow. — متخالف Opposing, contrary, See نخالفي or ضلفة — ينصر — ضلفة — خیر Better, See خیر Good. — ضرب He caused to beat, He will assist, See نصر Assistance; or, he assisted. — ضرب A blow; or, he beat. — A learner must also pay great attention to the inseparable adverbs, prepositions, articles, and other initial letters; otherwise he must search any Dictionary in vain; ex. gr. بالاتفاق bilittifak By agreement, must be looked for not under ب but ا; ب being the preposition by, ا

the Arabic article, and اتفاق Agreement.—See Arab. Gramm. p. 145. for a full explanation of those particles; p. 9. and 40. for the radicals and serviles; and p. 43. 62. 70. &c. for the initial letters used in forming comparison, and the derivatives, tenses, or persons of verbs. — For the Persian particles used as prefixes, &c. see Advertisement to the Index of second edition of Mr. Jones's Persian Grammar.

Gentlemen who have resided abroad, and acquired the languages more from the practice of speaking than from reading, will not, I hope, too hastily condemn this, or indeed any other Dictionary, as deficient, because they may not be able at once to find a word which they know only by the ear. It may possibly be a corruption; and it is not improbable that it might be soon discovered, did they recollect the proper mode of spelling.—We should turn over Dr. Johnson to little purpose, for tow or tuff; for sy or sib; the manner in which tough and figb are generally pronounced: and the caution becomes infinitely more necessary in the Arabic and Persian tongues, where there are several letters which have nearly the same sound in many words; as ا and ع a—ت and ط t—س and ص s—ح and ک k—خ and ه h—ض and ظ Arab. d or dh—ظ Perf. z &c. The abbreviations used in the Dictionary are not numerous; and in general will be easily understood. — ^A marks words originally Arabic; and ^P those which are Persian. ^P is prefixed to such compounds, phrases, or authorities, where any Persian is introduced; tho' the greatest part may perhaps be Arabic; but thus they are found in Persian books — Pl. or plur. is plural — pl. pauc. a plural expressing a small quantity — Fem. feminine — Masc. masculine — dimin. diminutive — ex. gr. for example — coll. a collective noun — unit. a noun of unity — g, in the pronunciation of the Oriental words, is uniformly used, in this Dictionary for the hard sound of that letter in give, &c., j expressing the softer sound in gem — ch is always pronounced as charge; kh being substituted for ch in character. — ë final, in construction, is written ت t, and often by the Persians without the points o é. I recollect nothing further that appears to require explanation.

N. B. Some little variation will be found between the Dictionary and the Dissertation, especially with regard to the old Kings of Persia; which, upon respectable authorities, I endeavoured to reconcile with those mentioned by the Greeks. (See کي kai, &c.) But I have considered the subject with more attention in the Dissertation, to which I at present adhere. I have assigned my reasons, and the public will judge.

PERSIAN, ARABICK, AND ENGLISH.

اب

A Alif is the first letter of the Persian and Arabick alphabets. In Persian, when added to a noun, it forms a poetick vocative, as شاه shah O king for ای شاه ai shah; it is one of the imperatives and the contracted participle of آمدن amuden to come; when annexed to some adjectives it forms an abstract noun, as گرم gurma, warmth, from گرم gurm, warm; and it is often affixed redundantly to a word by the poets, without making any alteration in the sense, as گفتا gusta for گفت gust he said. In Arabick, it is called Hamza, as well as Alif; especially if accompanied by a vowel, or when it is a radical letter; having then in pointed books the little orthographical character ^ء placed over or under it, as أ ا. Prefixed to an Arabick verb or noun it marks an interrogation: if it precedes a proper name it denotes sometimes the vocative, when addressing a person near at hand, (the remoter vocatives being expressed by ایا &c.) When placed before nouns of quality, it forms proper names, as احمد Ahmed from حمد praise احسن Ahsan or Hasan from حسن beautiful, &c. It is likewise an interjection; it represents also Sunday, Taurus, &c. in Astronomical books; and the number One in Arithmetic; having besides a variety of other uses in the forming of plurals, the feminine gender, the comparative and superlative degrees, with many of the inflexions of the Arabick conjugations, moods and tenses; for all which see the grammar. Lastly, when superscribed with Wesla ^ء it is equal to two Alifs, having a very long broad sound, and is then either the remote vocative, Ho! hark ye! or the interjection of contempt, Fy, pho, &c. For words beginning with two Alifs or Hamzas vid. under او or ای.

^أ ab ^أ A father, master, possessor. ^أ An inventor of any thing. This word enters into the composition of a great number of Arabick names, varying its termination according to its case, having Abu in the nominative, Aba in the accusative, and Abi in the other cases, as Abubeker, Abadun, Abi Ismael, &c.

أ Idris الرريس The Arabian name for إخنوخ Enoch the prophet, (Genesis v. 21.) This name is derived from ders, which signifies study or meditation. The Arabians say that God sent thirty volumes to this antediluvian prophet, containing the secrets of the most occult sciences; in consequence of which, the books of Enoch have long enjoyed great reputation in the East. The prophecy of Enoch is mentioned by the apostle Jude in his epistle; and the Ethiopians have long alleged that it was still preserved, with his other books, in their language. M. du Peiresc made every effort to procure it, in the reign of Francis I. but in vain; and the learned have in general doubted of its existence, till lately that the ingenious and enterprising traveller Mr. Bruce has discovered the prophecy, during his residence in Abyssinia; several copies of which he has brought to Europe. The Mahometans attribute to Enoch the inventions of writing, of the needle, of astronomy, of arithmetick, and particularly of geomancy, or the art of fortune-telling by figures. The eastern Christians say that Enoch is the same with the Hermes, Mercury, or Trismegistus of the Egyptians.

Ajem, amongst the Arabians, carries the same idea as Barbarian with the Greeks, and Gentile among the Hebrews, implying every one not an Arabian by birth or descent; in consequence of which arabu ajem denotes All mankind; as Greeks and Barbarians, or Jews and Gentiles, did formerly among the natives of Greece and Judea. Ajem however has a more particular reference to the Persians, and signifies the natives in general of all those countries comprehended under the Persian empire.

muluk ajem Kings of Persia. Mirkond and Khondemir, in their histories, describe them as the most ancient monarchs in the world, their empire being supposed to be founded by Caiumaras, near 900 years before the Christian æra. They are divided into four great dynasties or families, called the Pisbadadians (legislators), Caianians (great kings), Asfcanians (from Ashek or Arshek the founder of this race, better known in Europe by the name of Arsacides) and the Saffanians, from Saffan the father of Ardeshir Babegan, the first king of that family, (whose posterity reigned from the beginning of the third to the middle of the seventh century; when they became extinct by the death of Yezdigird, killed in battle by the Arabians, under the khalifat of Omar, who then annexed Persia to the great empire of the Moslems). Under those dynasties are comprehended all the princes, known formerly to the Greeks by the appellations of the Assyrian, Chaldean, Babylonian, Median and Persian kings; whilst it may be observed, that the Greeks, as well as the Jews, have frequently mistaken the viceroys, governors, or lieutenants of those ancient monarchs of Persia for the kings themselves; their residence in the provinces nearest to Palestine and Europe having made them better known in the west than their sovereigns. Nebuchadnezzar, Baltazar, Cyrus, and Sennecherib, among others, were only governors of Babylonia and the adjacent districts, under Lohorab and other princes of the Caianian dynasty.

pe, The third letter of the Persian alphabet, is here blended with ب, agreeably to the general rule followed by the Persians themselves in the dictionaries of their language; which is also the case with regard to چ chim and ج jim, --- ژ zha and ز za, --- ک kaf and گ gaf, (tho' the points on this last letter are seldom attended to.)

used) To with, in, &c. Examples of words, to which these prepositions are prefixed, will frequently occur hereafter in alphabetical order.

His subjects were, upon religious grounds, so entirely devoted to his service, that they put themselves to death without hesitation the moment he gave the command; and, it may be easily supposed were equally ready, fearless of danger, to assassinate those whom Hassan

Saba, from motives of policy, avarice, or vengeance, chose to number with the dead. This despotick and most singular influence over his followers rendered him so dreadfully formidable that he forced tribute from most of the neighbouring princes; many of whom kept bodies of Batanists in their pay, in order to dispatch those who were dangerous to their power; in consequence of which several Khalifs, Sultans, Generals, Vizirs and other distinguished leaders, fell under the daggers of those most determined villains.

The old romances of Arabia and Persia allot them a particular country called Jinnistan, where they live upon perfume alone; and conceive them to be so extremely beautiful, that they call a lovely woman پري زاده Perizade, born of the Peris (the name of the second daughter of Darius, whom the Greeks have called Parisatis; corrupting in the same manner fitarah (a star) into Statira, and rusben (splendor) into Roxana). The Dives, Jins or Genii, are another species of ideal beings, but the reverse of the Peris, being ugly, malignant, and perpetually at war with them and with mankind, whom the Peris are supposed constantly to protect.
